

Zechariah

Introduction

There are some reasons why this portion of Old Testament Scripture should especially be precious to Christians. I will mention only two. First—because of the clear and striking manner in which it testifies of our Lord Jesus. Luther calls Zechariah Ausbund der Propheten—the quintessence of Old Testament prophecy—and this is especially true in reference to Messianic prophecy. Indeed it seems to be the special aim and mission of Zechariah to condense and concentrate in small compass, and in his own peculiar terse style, almost all that has been revealed to the "former prophets" about the person and mission of Messiah—about His divine and yet truly human character, and of His sufferings and of the glory that should follow.

His betrayal for thirty pieces of silver (ch. 11); the Roman spear with which He was "pierced" by His own nation; the awakened sword of Jehovah's justice which, in love for a lost world, and for the sin of the guilty, smites the Good Shepherd, "the Man" who is God's own equal; and the outcome of His sufferings, when He alone shall bear the glory, and "shall sit and rule upon His throne," and when upon His blessed brow, once crowned with thorns, shall at last be put the crown of glory:—these, as well as other striking details, are brought before us in this prophecy very vividly and in small compass.

"The Messianic prophecies of Zechariah," says Hengstenberg, "are only second to those of Isaiah in distinctness. In this, the last prophet but one, the prophetic gift once more unfolded all its glory as a proof that it did not sink from exhaustion of age, but was withdrawn according to the deliberate counsel of the Lord."

Secondly, on account of the light it throws on the events of the last times preceding the great and terrible "Day of the Lord," which is fast approaching.

The presence in Palestine of a representative remnant of the Jewish people in a condition of unbelief; the fiery furnace of suffering into which they are there to be thrown; their great tribulation and anguish occasioned by the final siege of Jerusalem by the confederated Gentile armies under the headship of him in whom both Jewish and Gentile apostasy is to reach its climax; how in the very midst of their final sorrow the spirit of grace and supplication shall be poured upon them, and they shall look upon Him whom they have pierced and mourn; how this blessed One whom they so long rejected shall suddenly appear as their Deliverer, and His feet stand "in that day" on the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east; how God shall again say "Ammi" to the nation which during the long centuries of their unbelief were "Lo-Ammi"—"not My people," and how Israel shall joyously respond, "Jehovah, my God"; how Israel's Messiah shall speak peace to the nations, and Israel himself enter at last on his priestly mission to the peoples for which he was originally destined, and Jerusalem become the center of God's fear and worship for the whole earth—all these and other solemn events of the time of the end are spoken of in this book with a clearness and distinctness as if they were occurrences of history instead of prophecies of the future.

About eighteen years had elapsed since the first year of Cyrus, when a remnant of those who were carried into captivity—both of Judah and of Israel—returned under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua the high priest.

The first zeal of the returned exiles was most beautiful. In the seventh month of the very year of their return they already rebuilt the altar of burnt-offering, and thus restored the sacrificial ritual which was suspended during the seventy years of captivity; and in the second month of the second year they solemnly set themselves to the task of rebuilding the temple amid circumstances of great national joy—not unmixed with tears and sorrow on the part of those who remembered the temple "in its first glory."

Soon, however, owing to causes into which I cannot enter here, carelessness and indifference took possession of their hearts, and the holy task of building the House which served as the visible symbol of fellowship between Jehovah and His covenant people was neglected. Then was raised up Haggai, the first of the great trio of post-exilic prophets, who, by scathing denunciations, blended with glorious promises of present help, and announcements of a special and "greater glory," which should be manifested in this "latter House," succeeded in rousing the nation zealously to resume the work of building the Temple. It was then, right in the midst of the movement inaugurated by Haggai, that Zechariah was commissioned by God with further messages. The difference between the two prophets seems to be this, that while Haggai's task was chiefly to rouse the people to the outward task of building the Temple, Zechariah took up the prophetic labors just where Haggai had left it, and sought to lead the people to a complete spiritual change, one of the fruits of which would of necessity be increased zeal in the building of God's House, the completion of which he witnessed four years later.

In structure Zechariah's prophecy has this in common with Haggai's, that they both consist of only four addresses of unequal length.

The four divisions in Zechariah are these:

I. The introductory address, which is a call to repentance (ch. 1:1-6).

II. A series of eight visions, followed by a striking symbolical transaction, all shown to the prophet in one night, mainly of a consolatory character, and though, having an historical foreground, lead up to the "last days," and to the finale of God's dealings with Israel and the nations (ch. 1:6 to end of ch. 6).

III. An address in the fourth year of Darius—two years after his first message, in answer to a question on the observance of the national fasts put by a deputation from Bethel (chaps. 7 and 8).

IV. A prophecy delivered at a later period, which, starting from the standpoint of a more immediate future, brings us up to the very climax of things when "the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee"; and when, as a result, "Jehovah shall be King over all the earth, and there shall be but one Lord, and His name One."

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Zechariah 1:1-6

The prophet's first words were startling enough to rivet their attention: "With great displeasure was Jehovah displeased against your fathers."

That this was a fact, those to whom the prophet spoke could not deny. They had seen the proofs of it with their own eyes in the desolations of the land, and in the seventy years' captivity of the people.

But although Jehovah was angry against them on account of their long-continued apostasies and provocations, His anger was now turned away, and He was ready to comfort them if they would but turn from the evils which had brought those calamities on their fathers, and return to God with all their hearts. To such a turning the prophet, in the Name of God, now most solemnly invites them:

"Return unto Me, saith Jehovah of hosts, and I will (or 'that I may') return unto you, saith Jehovah of hosts"—the repetition of the august Name of Jehovah being meant to emphasise the divine authority and sanction of the call, and the certainty of the blessed result which would follow from obedience to it; since He who invites them to come back is none other than "Jehovah of hosts," who, while Lord of all things, at whose call all created forces must marshal themselves as if for war, is at the same time the covenant God of the history of Redemption, whose very Name is as "a strong tower" for the righteous, and who is only "waiting to be gracious," and would therefore most certainly return unto them.

The gracious invitation and assurance is followed by a warning lest, following in the footsteps of their fathers' disobedience, they would incur the like displeasure of God and experience the like punishment:

"Be not ye like to your fathers, to whom the former prophets cried, saying, Turn, we beseech you, from your evil ways, and from your evil doings: but they heard not, neither did they hearken unto Me, saith Jehovah." (Zech. 1:4)

We have here incidentally given us a kind of inspired resume of one great part of the work "of the former prophets" and its result. The mission of the prophets was comprehensive and many-sided; they spoke to all times, making known to the children of men the counsels of the Eternal. They spoke from the mouth of the Omniscient God, foretelling things to come; but to the current generations in which they lived they were chiefly preachers of righteousness, and their constant cry was, "Repent."

They saw Israel—and in this respect Israel is but a type of man—wandering ever further from God, and they cried, "Turn ye, turn ye"; for why will ye wander from the source of life and blessedness, and die, O House of Israel? That repentance was the keynote in the preaching of all "the former prophets" will be seen at a glance if I quote here only a few of their chief utterances.

Taking the books as they are now arranged in the Old Testament canon, without strict regard to chronology and beginning with Isaiah—his chief message to the generation in which he lived, after denouncing their sins, may be summed up in the proclamation found in the 55th chapter:

"Seek ye Jehovah while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near. Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto Jehovah, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon"

Jeremiah was again and again sent with the gracious message:

"Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith Jehovah; and I will not cause My face to fall upon you in anger: for I am the gracious One, saith Jehovah, and I will not retain anger forever. Only acknowledge thine iniquity, that thou hast transgressed against Jehovah thy God" (Jer. 3:12, 13).

Ezekiel's touching appeal to the people in the Name of God, who solemnly bids the prophet proclaim that He has no pleasure in the death of the sinner, I have already quoted. It was repeated again and again in the course of his ministry. Hark, for instance, to his cry in the 18th chapter:

"Repent, and be turned from your transgressions whereby ye have transgressed, and iniquity shall not be your ruin. Cast away from you all your transgressions; and make you (or 'get you') a new heart and a new spirit: for why will ye die, O house of Israel?"

And these were but the continuance and repetition of the still earlier voice of Hosea, Joel, Amos, and Zephaniah, who cried:

"O Israel, return unto Jehovah thy God; for thou hast fallen by thine iniquity" (Hos. 14:1). "Turn ye, even to Me, with all your heart, and with fasting, and, with weeping, and with mourning; and rend your heart, and not your garments, and turn unto Jehovah your God; for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth Him of the evil" (Joel 2:12, 13). "Seek ye Jehovah, and ye shall live" (Amos 5:4-6). "Before the decree bring forth, before the day pass as the chaff, before the fierce anger of Jehovah come upon you, before the day of the Lord's anger come upon you, . . . seek righteousness, seek meekness: it may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger" (Zeph. 2:2, 3).

But, alas! to all these cries Israel lent but a deaf ear. The result of all the ministry of the former prophets, as far as the nation was concerned, is summed up in the words: "But they did not hear nor hearken unto Me, saith Jehovah." (Zech. 4:4)

On the last page of pre-exilic history are written the following solemn words: "Moreover, all the chiefs of the priests, and the people, transgressed very much after the abominations of the nations; and polluted the house of the Lord which He had hallowed in Jerusalem. And the Lord God of their fathers sent to them by His messengers, rising up betimes (early or in good time) and sending; because He had compassion on His people, and on His dwelling place: but they mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and misused His prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, till there was no remedy" (2 Chr. 36:14-16). They then went to Babylon, which inaugurated the period called in the New Testament "The times of the Gentiles," which are still running; and when at the end of the seventy years a remnant was in the grace and faithfulness of God brought back, the tone and substance of the old message did not change. The cry was taken up by Haggai and Zechariah; and with the proclamation, "Return unto Me, and I will return unto you, saith Jehovah" (Mal.3:7), the voice of Old Testament prophecy finally dies away.

For the sake of showing that the preaching of repentance is still the distinguishing mark of God's true messengers, let us note how this old cry is carried over, also, into the pages of New Testament history. After Malachi a pause of four long centuries intervened, during which there was no voice nor vision nor answer of God; but when the long silence was broken, the first words that fell on Israel's ear from the mouth of the Baptist were, "Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand"; and when at last the Greatest and last of the prophets, who was Himself to inaugurate "the kingdom of heaven" on earth, stood in their midst, His first public utterance, too, was the same old familiar cry, "Repent!" (Matt. 4:17). Oh, that Israel had known the day of his visitation, and hearkened at last to this gracious invitation—at least when uttered by the lips of the Son of God Himself! But they knew not, nor did they understand. The proud Pharisees and scribes, like so many of their fathers before, did not think they needed to repent. Did they not cry, "We are the Temple of the Lord"? Were there not the many voices of the false prophets who cried, "Peace, peace"? "Have we not Abraham to our father?" "We are God's favored nation; no evil will befall us." And so again they showed themselves the successors of those who killed the prophets, and stoned them that were sent unto them and cried—as they did of all the prophets before Him—"Away with this disturber of our peace, He is no friend of our nation; it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not."

Christ died and rose again, according to the Scriptures; but before His ascension He entrusted His disciples with a message for the world, and in that last commission (Luke 24:46-49) "repentance" still finds a prominent place. And the keynote in the Apostolic preaching—whether in Jerusalem or in Athens, whether to Jew or to Greek—was, "God commandeth all men everywhere to repent." "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the time of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord" (Acts 3:19, 17:30).

And we may pause and ask, Is there less need for this kind of preaching now than there was in Jeremiah's or in Paul's time? Is man's attitude and tendency more God-ward and heavenward now than it was then? Is man all right, or is he radically wrong? Does man's natural course lead to life, or does the end of it lead to death? Upon the answer to these questions depends the answer as to who are the true prophets and genuine friends of man; whether those who cry, "Turn ye, turn ye; for why will ye die?" or those who speak of "the world's progress," and tell corrupt, sinful men that they are themselves potentially Christs, who need only develop "the good that is in them," and who still cry, "Peace, peace," although there is no peace. We may be forgiven for digressing somewhat beyond the limits of the passage before us; but we believe that this question of repentance touches the very heart of man's relationship to God. It shows us, as we have seen, man's condition as apostate from God, with his face turned away from the fountain of light and life. It tells us that man's great need is to forsake not only his outward ways, but also his thoughts, and to return to the Lord; and it reveals to us the grace and love of God, who has no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but yearns for his return, "because He delighteth in mercy," and has, at the cost of the sacrifice of His own Son, devised a means for reconciliation, "that His banished be not expelled from Him" (2 Sam. 14:14).

Let us return, therefore, unto the Lord, and He, according to His promise, will "return unto us"—we with our sins, He with His grace and forgiveness; we with our poverty and need, He with His exceeding "riches" and infinite fulness; we with our wretchedness and fears, He with His "everlasting consolation and good hope"—yea, with His peace, which passeth all understanding, and with His joy, which is unspeakable and full of glory. And if we find no power of ourselves to come to Him, let us pray, as Israel will by and by: "Turn Thou us unto Thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned" "Cause Thy face to shine, and we shall be saved" (Lam. 5:21; Ps. 80:3).

We now come to the last two verses of Zechariah's preparatory address, which may be summarised as a warning against disobedience, illustrated and enforced by the sad experiences of their fathers. "Your fathers, where are they?" (Zech. 1:5) "They did not hear nor hearken"; they disbelieved and disobeyed My word; but what was the consequence? What good did they gain? what success did they experience in resisting Me? "Where are they?" Did they not for that very reason spend their days in wretchedness, and pine away in captivity? "And the prophets, do they live for ever?"

Probably we have here the record of a dialogue between the prophet, speaking in the Name of God, and the people; at least so some of the leading Jewish commentators understand it—namely, that when the prophet pointed them to their fathers, saying, "Where are they?" the people impudently answered, "And the prophets, do they live for ever?"—have they, too, not shared in the sorrows of the nation and passed away like our fathers? And then the prophet replies, "Yes; the prophets, though God's mouthpiece, were but men, and are gone, 'but My words and My statutes, which I commanded My servants the prophets, did they not overtake your fathers, so that they had to return and say, that as Jehovah of hosts hath thought (or "determined") to do unto us, according to our ways, and according to our doings, even so hath He dealt with us?"

Oh, that men would learn to distinguish between the frailty and weakness of the best of God's messengers and the eternal character and unfailing veracity of His message! The prophets are no more, but the words which those holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost are still with us, verifying themselves, and in spite of man's unbelief accomplishing, whether in judgment or in mercy, that whereunto they were sent.

Oh, that men would take warning from the past history of Israel, and note the faithfulness of God in carrying out His threatenings as well as His promises!

Oh, that you would be wise and "give glory to Jehovah your God before He cause darkness, and before your feet stumble upon the dark mountains, and while ye look for light He turn it into the shadow of death, and make it gross darkness" (Jer. 13:15-17).

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What warning does the prophet see in God's dealing with the former generation?

Zech. 1:2

Zechariah 1:7-17

About three months after the introductory address which, as we have seen, was mainly a call to repentance, the series of eight visions, followed by the very significant symbolical transaction of the crowning of the high priest Joshua, the son of Josedech, was given to the prophet. In this case the exact day of the month is indicated, most probably because it was a day of special significance and of sacred association to the restored remnant. It was "in the twenty and fourth day of the eleventh month, that is, in the month Shebat, in the second year of Darius." On that very day just five months before, the spirit of Zerubbabel and of Joshua, and "of all the rest of the people," being stirred up by God through the preaching of Haggai, commenced to work again in the rebuilding of the temple (Hag. 1:14, 15).

On the same day also just three months later—that is, a month after Zechariah's introductory address—the same prophet delivered his last two stirring messages, the first ending with the promise, "From this day will I bless you," and the second containing the announcement that God would shake the heavens and the earth, and overthrow the thrones and kingdoms of the nations all with a view to the restoration and exaltation of the Davidic House, which was then represented by Zerubbabel (Hag. 2:10-23); so that there is probability in the suggestion that it is on account of its sacred connection with Haggai's ministry, and especially on account of it being the day on which they earnestly took in hand the work of rebuilding the temple, that it was chosen as a day for further divine revelations. (This 24th day of the eleventh month was, as already stated, exactly two months after the last promise issued through Haggai to the people that the Lord would henceforth bless His nation, and would glorify it in the future. (It was also on the 24th of the month that Daniel, after having previously fasted and mourned for three full weeks, had received the vision of the things noted in the Scripture of truth (Dan. 10:4-21)).

This 24th day of the eleventh month was, as already stated, exactly two months after the last promise issued through Haggai to the people that the Lord would henceforth bless His nation, and would glorify it in the future.

"To set forth in symbol and imagery this blessing and glorification, and to exhibit the leading features of the future conformation of the Kingdom of God, was the object of these revelations."

These visions, which addressed themselves more to the prophet's mental and spiritual sight than to his ears, are called debhar Yehovah—"the word of Jehovah"—because the pictures seen in the spirit, together with their interpretation, had the significance of verbal revelations, and through them the will and purposes of Jehovah were communicated to him.

Divinely communicated visions were one of the "divers manners" in which God spake in times past in the prophets to the fathers, even as we read in Num. 12:6: "If there be a prophet among you, I, Jehovah, will make Myself known to him in a vision; I will speak with him (literally, 'in him') in a dream."

The whole series of visions which were granted to the prophet, probably in rapid succession one after the other with only short pauses between, in one night, though distinct and in a sense each one complete in itself—"form (as we shall see) a substantially connected picture of the future of Israel linked on to the then existing time, and closing with the prospect of the ultimate completion of the Kingdom of God."

The general plan in all these visions is first to present the symbol, and then, on a question being put, to supply the interpretation.

What the Prophet saw

In the dead of night—not in a dream, but in an ecstatic condition, in which his mental and spiritual faculties were altogether awake and attuned to God, so that he could fully respond to the operations and promptings of the Spirit, and pictures of divine objects could be reflected on his soul—he saw "a man" riding upon a red horse, standing among myrtles "in the bottom," or, more literally, "in" (or "by") the "deep," and behind him, at his command, were horses (most probably with riders upon them), red, speckled (or "sorrel," or "bay"), and white.

Now, before passing from this verse we must consider:

(a) Who is "the man"? (b) What is represented by the myrtles? and (c) the significance of the color of the horses.

The "man," as we are told in v. 11, was the Malakk Yehovah—the Angel of Jehovah, who is none other than the "Angel of His face," the Divine "Angel of the Covenant," the Second person in the Blessed Trinity, whose early manifestations to the patriarch and prophets, as the "Angel" or Messenger of Jehovah in the form of man, were anticipations of His incarnation and of that incomprehensible humiliation to which He would afterwards condescend for our salvation.

It is pretty generally agreed that the myrtles symbolize Israel, and it is not without significance that this particular symbol is chosen. Not the proud cedar, not the lofty, far-spreading oak—the symbols of the great world powers—but the lowly, fragrant myrtle, growing for the most part in the shady valley out of the world's gaze, is chosen to represent the covenant people. Yes, it is with the lowly, with those of a contrite and humble spirit, that the High and Lofty One who inhabits eternity, ever dwells and identifies Himself (Isa. 57:15, 66:2).

Lastly, before passing on from the 8th verse, just a few words on the significance of the colors of the horses. That they symbolize the mission on which these angelic hosts are about to be sent forth, there can, I think, be no doubt, in spite of Dr. Wright's confident statement that "any attempt to assign any grounds for the employment of the special colors is futile."

In Isa. 63 it is in garments dyed red that the Messiah goes forth in the day of vengeance to tread the nations in His anger, and to trample them in His fury. In our vision it doubtless signifies the same thing—namely, the readiness of the Angel of Jehovah to go forth with His angelic cohorts to execute swift judgment on Israel's oppressors.

The exact color to be understood by the word seruqqim, translated in the A.V. "speckled," or "bay," as in the margin, or "sorrel," as in the R.V., cannot be fixed with certainty. I might fill several pages with the guesses and suggestions and disputations on this word by the learned, but it most probably is meant to describe a mixed color—a combination of the first and last mentioned in the passage—and would signify that those mounted on these horses were to be sent forth on a mission of a mixed character—namely, of judgment and mercy; while the white is the symbol of victory, triumph, and glory (Rev. 6:2), which shall be to God's people after their great champion rides forth "conquering and to conquer," and executing vengeance on their enemies.

And the vision of the legions of angels mounted and ready to obey the command of their great Captain was doubtless intended to convey to the prophet the message which he was to impress on the people, that "the chariots of God are twenty thousand, even myriads of angels"; that with Him was all the requisite power and resources for the deliverance of His people, and the destruction of their foes. It was not because His hand had become shortened and His ear heavy, or that there was a lack either of might or willingness to save on His part, that they had become subject to the power of the Gentiles; but because their sins had for a time separated them from their God, and their iniquities had caused His protecting and guiding power to be withdrawn from them.

The answer to the prophet's question, "What are these?" in v. 9, is given by "the man" that stood among the myrtles, in the 10th verse: "These are they whom Jehovah hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth." How full of consolation for God's people is a statement like this! Satan, when appearing as the accuser of Job in the presence of God, said that he came "from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it." And what the aim and object of his restless activity in the earth is, we are told by the Apostle Peter in his earnest warning, "Be sober, be watchful, for your adversary the devil (full of hatred and fiendish cunning, as his names imply, and ever ready with fresh traps and snares for our destruction)—as a roaring lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour." If left to ourselves and his devices for one day, where should we be? But, blessed be God, "the Angel of Jehovah encampeth (as with a great invisible host) round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them"; and if there are evil, malignant spirits (ever restlessly walking to and fro in the whole earth on their mischievous intent of hindering, if they cannot frustrate, the gracious purposes of God and the manifestation of His Kingdom on the earth), God also has His messengers who walk to and fro to counteract and frustrate Satan's designs, and to succor and shield, and in many more ways than we know, to be ministering spirits to them who shall be heirs of salvation.

In our vision, however, the swift messengers were in the first instance only sent out to reconnoitre the earth and the state of the nations in their relation to the land and people of Israel; for, as far as God's governmental dealings with the nations are concerned, all things must be viewed in their relation to that people in whom are bound up the purposes of God for all mankind.

In "answer" probably to the unexpressed inquiry of the Angel of Jehovah, these angelic messengers give in their report: "We have walked to and fro through the earth, and, behold, all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest."

This description of the Gentile world was intended by contrast to bring more strikingly to light the mournful condition of Israel. All the nations lived in undisturbed peace and prosperity. In short, all were at rest except the "tribes of the wandering foot and weary breast"; who, though a remnant of them had returned, were ground down under the yoke of the Gentiles, while Judea was still, for the most part, lying waste, and Jerusalem was still without walls exposed in a most defenceless manner to all the insults of Israel's enemies. The nations had scattered God's people and had taken possession of their land, and were now in undisturbed enjoyment of it. No one cared for the afflictions of Zion, or troubled himself for the sorrows of Israel.

"Then the Angel of Jehovah answered (i.e., 'the implied longing' which was in his heart) and said, O Jehovah of hosts, how long wilt Thou not have mercy on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah, against which Thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years?"

If the very fact of the presence amongst them of the Angel of Jehovah, who in ancient times led His people and brought them into the promised land, and smote all their enemies before them, was intended, as we saw when dealing with the 8th verse, to be in itself a message of comfort to the now oppressed and depressed Israel, how much more full of consolation must have been the fact of His appearing as the Advocate and Intercessor on their behalf?

And He who here cries, "How long, Jehovah of hosts, wilt Thou not have compassion on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah?" has not changed in His attitude of longing and concern for His own nation. When in the fulness of time He permanently took upon Himself our human form, and became real man, we still read of Him as being moved with compassion on beholding Israel's weary multitudes, who were as sheep having no shepherd, and as weeping over Jerusalem; and we may be sure, also, that in those whole nights of prayer and intercession before the Father, the people which are "His own," and the city which was to be the seat of His throne, had a large and central place. Even on the cross He prayed, "Father; forgive them, for they know not what they do"; and when He rose and ascended to the right hand of God as the great High Priest of His people, Israel is still a subject of His intercessions. "For Zion's sake He doth not hold His peace; for Jerusalem's sake He doth not rest until her righteousness go forth as brightness, and her salvation as a lamp that burneth."

That the nations from the very commencement of "the times of the Gentiles" have been guilty of helping forward the affliction, let the history of Israel, written for the most part in their blood, testify. God scattered Israel (Jer. 31:10); but the nations among whom they have come trampled upon them, and put a yoke of iron upon their necks, and made them "to howl" all the day long (Isa. 52:5), because of their oppressions. God gave them over to punishment, but, at the same time, warned the nations, saying, "Make not a full end" (Jer. 5:10); but they have tried, if possible, to destroy them, and to cut off their very remembrance from the earth. God gave over for a time "the dearly beloved of His soul into the hand of her enemies" (Jer. 12:7): "I was wroth with My people," He says, addressing Babylon, the first, and also in many Scriptures the great, representative of all Gentile world-powers: "I polluted mine inheritance and gave them into thine hand, and thou didst show them no mercy" (Isa. 47:6).

"Therefore, thus saith Jehovah, I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies"—which, on account of its certainty, is expressed in the present or perfect tense. This, which has been already symbolically set forth to the prophet by the standing of the Angel of Jehovah in the midst of the myrtles, is the very heart and substance of "the good words and comforting words" which are the message of this vision. It was the hiding of His face—the withdrawal of Himself—that occasioned all these calamities in their night of darkness. So long as Jehovah was with them, neither Assyria nor Babylon, nor all the forces of the universe, could have prevailed against them; but when His glory was withdrawn, then they became a prey to the Gentiles—"the boar out of the wood" came and wasted it; the "wild beast of the field" came and devoured it. But not forever has Jehovah forsaken His people and the land which He has chosen as the center of the unfolding of His purposes of mercy to all mankind. "I will go," He says, "and return to My place till they acknowledge their offence" (or literally, "till they declare themselves guilty"), "and seek My face; in their affliction" (literally, "in their tribulation") "they shall seek Me early" (or earnestly), and then He will return unto them with mercies; and "His going forth is sure as the morning, and He shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter rain that watereth the earth" (Hos. 5:15, 6:1-3).

In its fulness this promise will only be fulfilled when "this same Jesus," whom at His first coming they handed over to the Gentiles to be crucified, and who, after His resurrection, ascended back into heaven into the glory which He had with the Father before the world was, shall "return" in the manner and under the circumstances described by this same prophet in the last three chapters of this prophecy. Then, in the once marred face, and in the wounded hands and feet of Him whom they once pierced, shall they fully learn the fulness and manifoldness of God's "mercies."

Two or three particular instances and outward signs of "that all-containing mercy" of His restored presence in their midst, are specially named: (a) "My house shall be built in it, saith Jehovah of hosts" as the visible sign and pledge of the restored fellowship between Him and His people; (b) And "a line shall be stretched forth over Jerusalem" to mark off the space it is to occupy in its restored condition, and the plan upon which it is to be arranged. (c) And not only shall His house be rebuilt and Jerusalem be restored on a grander scale than before, but all the land is to feel the blessed effect of the restored relations between Jehovah and His people. "Cry yet again, saying, Thus saith Jehovah of hosts: My cities"—yes, they are peculiarly His, as is the case with no other land and no other cities, even as the people which shall inhabit it is peculiarly His, above all other nations of the earth—"through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad"—or "overflow," the word being used of the "gushing forth of a fountain" in Prov. 5:16, i.e., they shall overflow, not only with spiritual prosperity, but with houses filled with citizens, and with abundance and plenty. (d) Finally, both as the ground and climax of all, come the last of the "good words." "And Jehovah shall yet comfort Zion" after her long night of sorrow, and however contrary to all appearance and human probability, "shall yet choose Jerusalem" or, by the above enumerated and many other acts of loving-kindness toward her, demonstrate in the sight of the whole world the fact and the immutability of His original choice of her—this last sentence being the first of a threefold inspired repetition by Zechariah of the words of Isa. 14:1, where we read, "For Jehovah will have compassion on Jacob, and yet choose Israel, and set them, in their own land: and the stranger shall be joined with them, and they shall cleave to the house of Jacob."

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Can you see how the colors of the horses represent a mission of mixed character, namely: red for judgment, mixed for mercy and white for victory, triumph and glory?

God was displeased with those nations that were at ease. Could this be because they have little concern for Israel's problem and whatever help they gave it was "with evil intent"?

Give instances how the Lord is still with His people Israel "encamped" with invisible hosts.

Lev. 26:44 Isa. 63:7-9 Jer. 30:11

Zechariah 1:18-21

This second short vision is in a sense a continuation of the comforting message contained in the first, for it shows how the Gentile nations against whom Jehovah is "very sore displeased," because they have each in turn "helped forward the affliction" by scattering Israel and treading down Jerusalem, shall themselves be broken and dissipated. The prophet had probably been absorbed in thought and meditation on what he saw and heard in the first vision; but being directed, perhaps, by the interpreting angel to look up again, he beheld—not only with the outer eye, but with the eyes of his soul and whole inner being, which had been prepared for the reception of these Divine revelations—"four horns" and on his appealing to his angelic teacher, who stood by his side, for the meaning of these, the brief answer is given: "These are the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem."

The "Horns"

Let us briefly ponder over the symbolism of these two verses before proceeding to the second part of the vision.

"Horns" are used in Scripture as emblematic of power and pride of conscious strength (Amos 6:13; Ps. 75:4, 5, 92:10), and are sometimes explained by the sacred writers themselves as representing the ruling powers of the world (Dan. 8; Rev. 17:3-12).

The number "four" may also, but in a secondary sense, stand, as some contend, for the four directions of heaven, or the four "corners" of the earth, and be designed to indicate the universality of the enmity which is directed against Israel. In that case, to use the language of a learned commentator who thinks only of the past, the four horns would "represent the enemies of Israel on every side: Edom and Egypt in the south; the Philistines in the west; the Ammonites and Moabites in the east; and from the north the Syrians, Assyrians, and especially the Chaldeans." Or, according to another commentator who views this prophecy in relation to the then present, "the number 'four' refers to the four cardinal points of the horizon, indicating that wherever God's people turned there were enemies to encounter."

But there can be no doubt, according to our judgment, especially if we remember the fact that it is the characteristic of Zechariah's visions and prophecies, that the divine messages contained in them are generally based on revelations already granted to the former prophets, that in this vision of the four horns there is a direct reference to the four great world-powers, differently represented by the four metals in the great image, and four great beasts in chapters 2 and 7 of Daniel's prophecies—the only four empires which were, or are, to rise till the kingdom of Messiah, the fifth of Daniel's visions, overthrows and absorbs all others in its universal dominion. This was the view of the most authoritative of Jewish commentators. Thus Kimchi says, "These are the four monarchies—and they are the Babylonian monarchy, the Persian monarchy, and the Grecian monarchy, and so the Targum of Jonathan has it (instead of four horns), the four monarchies." (He does not name the fourth)

In spite of all the great Gentile powers, who would each in turn take up the work of scattering and afflicting Israel, Israel would not be wholly swallowed up nor be overwhelmed, but would remain when all those powers should have disappeared, and would triumph in God's deliverance when the memory of their mighty enemies should be buried in shame and oblivion.

To us, looking back upon a period—the length of which was unforeseen even by prophets, embracing some two and a half millenniums—during which this comparative handful of people have been "scattered" and "tossed" about, by and among the nations, without being destroyed from off the earth, and without losing its national characteristics and identity, the marvel of Israel's continued preservation must appear much greater than to any one living in the time of Zechariah or Daniel, and can only be accounted for by the special providences and interpositions of Him who swore that so long as the sun and the ordinances of the moon and the stars continue, so long should Israel continue a nation before Him "for ever"; and who said in advance, even before the course of these four great Gentile world-powers, who would be permitted to scatter Israel, commenced: "For I am with thee, saith Jehovah, to save thee: for I will make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee; but I will not make a full end of thee, but I will correct thee in measure (or 'with judgment'), and will in no wise leave thee unpunished" (Jer. 30:2). Well might the inspired writer of Ps. 129, looking back, not only on the particular period embraced in the prophetic "times of the Gentiles," but on the whole course of Gentile oppression, exclaim in the name of the remnant of Israel:

"Many a time (or, more literally, 'greatly') have they afflicted me from my youth; yet they have not prevailed against me"

And there is yet a future, or final, culminating "affliction," "trouble," or "tribulation," as the same Hebrew word is elsewhere rendered, awaiting Israel after a large remnant of them are returned to their land in a condition of unbelief, when all nations will be gathered in a final siege of Jerusalem (Zech. 13, 14); but even then, when the nations cry, "Come, let us destroy them from being a nation, that the name of Israel be no more held in remembrance" (Ps. 83:4)—one more blow, and the Jewish nation will be no more—the answer of the saved remnant, who are delivered by the sudden appearance of their Messiah, will be: "I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of Jehovah"—Yet they have not prevailed against me.

Israel is indestructible. The bush may burn, but it cannot be consumed, because God has said: "Though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee."

Who are these workmen, or smiths? "Symbols of divine judgment" in a general way, says one learned commentator. "Symbols of the instruments of the divine Omnipotence by which the imperial power in its historical forms is overthrown," says another. But while it is true that this part of the vision is designed to show to the people of God in a general way, "that every hostile power of the world which has risen up against it, or shall rise up, be judged and destroyed," the number four standing over against the four horns does not only suggest that "for every enemy of God's people God has provided a counteracting power adequate to destroy it," but points to four powers also successive, though in the vision, like the four horns, presented together. And, if I am asked to state more definitely which four powers, I answer the first was the Medo-Persian, which by the hand of Cyrus broke down the horn of Babylon; the second was the Grecian, which by the hand of Alexander terrified and humbled the power of Persia; the third was Rome, which in its turn prostrated and trod down the power of Greece.

This last, the most terrible of all, not only acted as one of the "workmen" or "smiths" to terrify and break down the great world-power which immediately preceded it, but, in relation to the Jewish people and the Church of God, still exists as the last of the four horns; and in its revived form, under the leadership of the Satan-possessed head of the final confederacy of apostate Gentile world-powers, will bring about the climax of all the sorrows and the sufferings of Israel in the last "great tribulation, such as hath not been from the beginning of the world until now, no, nor ever shall be." It is to that time that the 7th chapter of Daniel refers: "After this I saw in the night vision, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly, and it had great iron teeth; it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet, and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns" (explained in v. 24 of the same chapter as signifying "ten kings" or "kingdoms"). "I considered the horns, and behold there came up among them another, a little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots, and behold in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things" (Dan. 7:6-8). But it is just then—when the strength and pride and ruthless cruelty and blasphemy of apostate world-power summed up in its head reaches its climax, that "the horn of the Gentiles" shall finally and forever be broken and cast out; for then the last "workman" or "smith" who, though seen by the prophet with the other three, is altogether diverse from them, and is only included in the vision with the others in order to present a full and complete view of the overthrow of all the four horns, shall suddenly appear to accomplish His terrible work of judgment. "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, there came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a Son of Man, and He came even to the Ancient of Days, and they brought Him near before Him (to be invested formally with the Kingdom immediately before He comes in the clouds of heaven to take possession of it); and there was given Him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve Him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion," and His kingdom "shall never be destroyed, nor shall the sovereignty thereof be left to another people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever" (Dan. 7:13, 14, 2:44, 45, R.V.).

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Who are the four horns? the four smiths?

What happens after the last horn has done his work?

Zechariah 2:1-13

The second and third visions stand in closest possible connection with the first. "The good words and comfortable words" (1:13), which were God's answer to the intercession of the Angel of Jehovah on behalf of "Jerusalem and the cities of Judah," contained a twofold message: First, that Jehovah is jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy, and is sore displeased (or "very angry") with the nations who are at ease, who helped forward the affliction of Israel (1:14, 15). Secondly, that He would "return to Jerusalem with mercies," the outward proofs of which would be (a) that His house would again be built in it, as the visible sign and pledge of the restored communion between Him and His people. (b) And "a line shall be stretched forth over Jerusalem," "to mark the space it is to occupy in its restored condition, and the plan on which it is to be arranged."

And not only should Jerusalem itself be rebuilt, but the whole land should feel the blessed effects of Jehovah's return to His people with mercies; and its cities, which He calls "My cities," should "through prosperity yet be spread abroad," or "yet overflow with prosperity" (1:16, 17).

Now, just as the second vision of the "horns," and "carpenters," or "workmen," is a continuation and sequel to the first part of the consoling message—for it shows how the Gentile nations, who "have helped forward the affliction" by scattering Israel and treading down Jerusalem, shall themselves be broken up and finally overthrown—so the third vision of the man with the measuring line is an amplification and realistic unfolding of the other "comfortable words" in the second part of the consoling message in reference to the future of the city, and the land, and the people, when Jehovah, in the Person of Messiah, shall "return to Jerusalem with mercies."

The joyful tidings in explanation of the symbolical act of the measuring of the city, with which the interpreting angel is to "run," that he may quickly communicate them to the prophet, that he also in his turn may communicate them to the people, contain a twofold message.

1. Jerusalem shall not only be restored but greatly enlarged, extending much beyond the boundaries of its ancient walls, "by reason of the multitude of men and cattle therein" it will "dwell", or "be inhabited" as perazoth, rendered in the A.V. "towns without walls," and in the R.V. "villages." But the word strictly describes "plains," or an open country in which there is nothing to circumscribe the inhabitants, or to prevent them from spreading themselves abroad: thus in Ezek. 38:11 it is used of the land where people dwell in peace and prosperity, "without walls, bolts, and gates," in contrast to those in walled cities; and in Esther 9:19 the inhabitants of the perazoth (the unprotected towns and villages) are distinguished from those living in the fortified capital, Susa. It denotes also a condition of confidence and safety, since in danger men resort to strong cities and fortified towns.

This again is in accord with the words of the former prophets in reference to the marvellous increase of the people, and the extended boundaries of the city and the land after the restoration: thus, for instance, we read in Isa. 49:19, 20, "For as for thy waste places and thy desolate places, and thy land that hath been destroyed, surely now shalt thou be too strait (small) for the inhabitants, and they that swallowed thee up shall be far away. The children of thy bereavement" ("the children that thou shalt have instead of those of which thou hast been bereaved"—it is addressed to Jerusalem) "shall yet say in thine ears, The place is too strait (small) for me; give place to me" ("make room") "that I may dwell," so that the limits of the city and the land shall be ever wider extended, and Jerusalem shall resemble a succession of "villages" on the open plains.

2. But a promise much greater than mere outward enlargement and material prosperity follows in the 5th verse: "For I, saith Jehovah, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory (or 'for glory') in the midst of her." This is one of the most beautiful and comprehensive promises in the Old Testament. It contains an assurance of protection—though inhabited as "villages" in an open plain, without visible walls or fortifications, it shall be "a strong city" and perfectly safe from all attacks and danger; for not only will Jehovah in that day "appoint salvation for walls and bulwarks" (Isa. 26:1), but He Himself (the "I" in v. 5 being very emphatic) will be a wall of fire—"as an inner circle" of perfect defence to those within, but for sure destruction to enemies who shall dare to approach from without.

And as He shall be her protection from without, so shall He be her glory from within, for "Jehovah shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory" (Isa. 60:19); and what is said of the heavenly Jerusalem shall, in a degree, be true also in that day of the restored earthly city, "The glory of the Lord shall lighten it, and the Lamb shall be the lamp thereof" (Rev. 21:23).

It is true that at the time this prophecy was uttered, and all along till now, "so long as Jerusalem remained unwall'd it was in continual fear and weakness," because it was encompassed by enemies on every side, and its inhabitants had not yet learned that it was Jehovah who was in truth their refuge and strength, and that "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman watcheth but in vain"; but prophecy points to a time when, after "Jehovah will have mercy on Jacob and choose Israel again, and set them in their own land," their enemies shall no more be permitted to afflict or molest them, and they shall have rest from their sorrow and their fear, and from the hard bondage wherein they were made to serve (Isa. 14:1-3). Then also Jehovah, in the Person of their Messiah Jesus, shall, from Jerusalem as the center, "judge among the nations, and rebuke many peoples: and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more"; and it will be quite safe for even the earthly Jerusalem, with "the King," "the Lord of hosts," in its midst, to be inhabited as villages in an open plain, without visible walls or fortifications.

Then, secondly, in reference to those who tell us that there is no need to suppose that there is any reference in this prophecy to a future period, I would repeat my remarks at the close of the exposition of the first chapter, that though there was doubtless a message in this vision to the generation to which the prophet was first commissioned to relate it, and there was a very partial and shadowy fulfilment of the promise of the rebuilding of the house and the city in the work accomplished by Zerubbabel and Joshua the son of Jehozadak, and by Ezra and Nehemiah, yet to limit this glorious prophecy to any period of Jerusalem's history while it is still being "trodden down of the Gentiles," which has never ceased to be the case from the time of the Babylonian Captivity to this day, is to misapprehend and misinterpret the scope of this as well as of all prophecy.

But, in truth, these beautiful words, "For I, saith Jehovah, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst of her," are really an announcement of the return of the Glory of the Personal Presence of Jehovah to Jerusalem, and an amplification of the words in the first vision, "I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies." I have elsewhere tried to show the full significance of Ezekiel's vision of the departure of the Glory of Jehovah from Jerusalem, which synchronized with the removal of governmental power from Judah, and the special characteristics of the present "Ichabod" period of Israel's history.

It was the withdrawal of Himself from their midst which has been the cause of all the helplessness and the sorrow and the darkness of the Jewish nation since the commencement of "the times of the Gentiles"; and that this period did not terminate with the first advent of our Lord is clear from Christ's own prophetic forecast of future events, in which He says: "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." It is true that if Israel's eyes had been opened to see the true character and divine majesty of that royal Babe born in Bethlehem and of the "mysterious man of Nazareth" (as a Jewish Rabbi has recently styled Him), they would have seen in Him a glory greater than that which dwelt in the symbolic cloud which led our fathers in the wilderness and which dwelt between the cherubim, and the promises of the return of the Personal Presence of Jehovah, no more to depart from their midst, might have been fulfilled; but Israel's eyes were holden then, and only a few Jewish disciples there were who saw the Glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ and could joyfully exclaim: "We beheld His Glory, the Glory of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." The nation as a whole saw "no form nor comeliness" to desire Him, so they "despised and esteemed Him not." In the end, after He had for three and a half years with outstretched arms continued to call Israel to Himself, but without response—that which was symbolized by the departure of the Glory from the Mount of Olives, depicted by Ezekiel, received a second personal and more striking fulfillment, when Jesus also, slowly and reluctantly, after shedding tears of sorrow for Jerusalem, and from the same spot whence the prophet saw the Glory depart, finally (after His atoning death and glorious resurrection) ascended out of sight.

But has the purpose of God been frustrated by Israel's unbelief, and will the exceeding great and precious promises in reference to the establishment of the Messianic Kingdom on this earth, with Jerusalem as its center, fail for evermore because (as the writer quoted above asserts) the Jewish people have not "kept the covenant committed to them"? Oh no; man's unbelief and disobedience may, in accord with the foreknowledge and infinite wisdom of God, cause the delay and postponement of God's predetermined counsel, which in this particular instance has been the occasion of salvation and blessing to untold millions of Gentiles (Rom. 11:11-15), but it can never frustrate it.

Jesus Christ came as a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God (not to annul or transfer), but to confirm the promises made unto the fathers (Rom. 15:8); and since their ratification in His own precious blood, all the promises of God in relation to the people and the land of Israel, as well as in relation to the "mercy" which He purposed from the beginning to show unto the Gentiles, have been made doubly sure.

Both the New Testament as well as the Old teach us to expect and look for the revelation of the Glory of Jehovah, when "all flesh shall see it together"; and then, when the Malakh Jehovah, with whom the symbolic cloud of glory was associated from the very first mention of it in the Scriptures (comp. Ex. 13:21, 22 with 14:12, 20), shall appear in His glory, not only in the form of man, but as "the same Jesus," visibly to establish God's rule over this earth, and to sit upon the throne of His father David—these visions and prophecies of the return of the Glory of Jehovah shall be fulfilled: "And Jehovah will create over the whole habitation of Mount Zion, and over her assemblies, a cloud of smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night: for over all the Glory shall be as a (marriage) canopy. And there shall be a pavilion for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and, for a refuge and for a covert from storm and from rain." (Isa. 4:5-6)

But though not in the form of visibility, as shall be the case in restored Jerusalem by and by, the precious promise of outward protection and inward illumination, contained in the words, "For I, saith the Lord, will be a wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst of her," is true to every one of you also, dear readers, who know experimentally the truth of the Apostle's words, "Whom, having not seen ye love, in whom though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." The Angel of Jehovah even now "encampeth" (with an invisible host) round about them that fear Him and delivereth them (Ps. 34:7); and because He Himself is a wall of fire round about us, and our life is hid with Christ in God, therefore "when the wicked, even mine enemies and foes" (whether visible or invisible, whether evil men or "wicked spirits"), "come upon me" (full of determination and fury) "to eat up my flesh, it is they" (the "they" is very emphatic) "who stumble and fall," and we can confidently say:

"Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; Though war should rise against me, even then will I be confident"

Ps. 27:2, 3.

And as He is our protection from without, so He is our light and our salvation within; for even now the word is true to those who walk with Him, "Jehovah shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory."

But to return to the exposition. Because Jehovah hath spoken well concerning Zion, and hath such purposes of grace concerning Jerusalem, while the nations which were then "at ease," and in apparently undisturbed peace, were about to be visited with judgment, those still in the lands of the exile are exhorted to hasten back to their home.

"Ho, ho, flee from the land of the north, saith Jehovah; for I have spread you abroad as the four winds of heaven, saith Jehovah. Ho Zion, escape, thou that dwellest with the daughter of Babylon"

The Hebrew ho or hoi, which has not always the same meaning, is here used simply as a particle of exhortation, and for calling attention.

"The land of the north" is the same as Babylon in the next verse, which, though really more an eastern, or south-eastern, power in relation to Palestine, is so called because, like Assyria before, it always invaded the Holy Land from the north, and the great caravan route entered the country from the same quarter. The whole passage seems to be made up of inspired echoes of similar utterances in the "former prophets"; as, for instance, Isa. 48:20: "Go ye forth of Babylon, flee ye from the Chaldeans; with a voice of singing declare ye, tell ye this, utter it even to the end of the earth: say ye, Jehovah hath redeemed His servant Jacob." And again in chap. 52:11 of the same prophet: "Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence, touch no unclean thing; go ye out of the midst of her; be ye clean, that bear the vessels of Jehovah." It is almost an exact reiteration also of the solemn words of Jeremiah: "Flee out of the midst of Babylon, and save every man his life: be not cut off in her iniquity. . . . My people, go ye out of the midst of her, and save yourselves every man from the fierce anger of Jehovah" (Jer. 51:6, 45).

This also had a primary, though only a partial, reference to the time in which the prophet wrote his visions. Though a remnant had returned, by far the greater number were still in the land to which they had been exiled. Some of them had grown rich and prosperous in the strange land. Their love for Jerusalem and all that it stood for had cooled down, and they were content to become dwellers "with the daughter of Babylon." They were reluctant to leave their comfortable homes and vineyards (which they had indeed been encouraged to build and to plant, but only as temporary possessions during the seventy years of the Captivity, Jer. 29) for the rough journey and hard life in the desolated land.

And so they are exhorted to flee out of Babylon, not only because of the goodness of the Lord which is to be shown to His people in their own land, but because of the evil which was about to overtake the country of their sojourn, and the calamities which would come on its people, occasioned probably by the two great rebellions in Babylonia, and the two captures of the city of Babylon—one by Darius in person, and the other by one of his generals—which had just taken place when the prophet wrote his visions.

At the same time, this call to come out of the Babylon that time, which met with only a very partial response, was also a foreshadowing of the future, when Jehovah shall lift up His hand again a second time to recover the remnant of His people which shall be left from Assyria and from Egypt, and from Pathros and from Cush, and from Elam and from Shinar, and from Hamath and from the islands of the sea: "And when they shall no more say, Jehovah liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt, but Jehovah liveth which brought up and which led the seed of the House of Israel from the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land." This is evident from the fact that this passage in Zechariah is based on those prophecies in Isaiah and Jeremiah which are quoted above, and which link the last great judgment of Babylon with the final deliverance and salvation of Israel, as may be seen from a study of the context, and also from the expression: "For I have spread you abroad as the four winds of heaven"; which in the passage we are considering immediately follows a call to come out of Babylon, and which, therefore, as it seems to me, looks on to a return subsequent to the time when the scattering shall have been universal, which was not the case till the second stage in the dispersion was inaugurated with the destruction of the second temple.

The verses which follow are among the most important in the Old Testament in reference to Messiah's character, and they sum up that part of His mission, in relation to Israel and the nations, which in the prophetic scriptures is always connected with His yet future glorious appearing.

"For thus saith Jehovah of hosts: After glory hath He sent Me unto the nations which spoiled you; for he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of His eye.

"For, behold, I will shake Mine hand over them, and they shall be a spoil to those that served them; and ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent Me.

"Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion; for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord.

"And many nations shall join themselves to the Lord in that day, and shall be My people, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent Me unto thee.

"And the Lord shall inherit Judah as His portion in the holy land, and shall yet choose Jerusalem."
(Zech. 2:8-12)

First, about His character.

The One who speaks is a Divine being, for it is He who lifts up His hand in judgment over the nations and makes them a spoil to those who formerly served them; it is He who, as "Jehovah," comes to dwell in the midst of His people, in fulfillment of the many promises of the reign of God on Mount Zion, and before His ancients gloriously, and who shall receive the many nations in that day as "His people"; and yet He, who in the whole series of promises in this chapter affirms of Himself what belongs to Almighty God only, shall in that day be known as the One whom Jehovah of hosts hath sent unto them.

Mystery of mysteries—here is Jehovah, yet sent by Jehovah! but it is the mystery of light and not of darkness to those who have learned to know the blessed Triune God of Israel as He is self-revealed in the Scriptures, and whose eyes have been opened to see in Him Who, in that synagogue of Nazareth, applied to Himself the words from the ancient Hebrew scroll: "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon Me; because Jehovah hath anointed Me to preach good tidings unto the meek;

He hath sent Me to bind up the broken-hearted," etc.—none other than "Jehovah Tzidkenu"—the "Wonderful Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace," whose goings forth are from of old, even "from the days of eternity"—who as the Malakh Yehovah, the Divine Messenger of the Covenant, appeared of old to patriarchs and prophets, and in the fullness of time became incarnate, and was "sent" of God with the message of peace and salvation to man, and to be the Apostle and High Priest of our profession.

But there is a necessity, perhaps, once again to point out that the "Lo, I come," of these passages in Isaiah, Zechariah (Zech. 2:10 KJV), and Zephaniah, are not the same as the "Lo, I come," of the 40th Psalm; for though in Old Testament prophecy the principle of perspective is not observed, and events of the most distant future are sometimes linked on to those which are near, or nearer, the prophet's own time, yet the great fact of the two separate advents of the Messiah—once in humiliation to suffer and die; and a second time in glory to dwell in the midst of Zion and to rule over the nations—stand out clear and distinct enough on the prophetic page, and to confound them is to throw the whole plan of God as revealed in the Scriptures into confusion.

The ancient Rabbis, puzzled by the two apparently contradictory series of prophecies in reference to Messiah's Person and mission—those which described Him as a Babe born in Bethlehem, and as a Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief, who is stricken for the transgressions of His people, and in the end pours out His soul unto death; and those which depict Him descending as a full-grown "Son of Man" in the clouds of heaven, in great power and glory, to build again the tabernacle of David, and to establish His kingdom—have formulated the belief in two Messiahs: a Messiah ben Joseph, who should suffer and die; and a Messiah ben David, who should come to conquer and reign. But we know that there are not two persons, but only advents, and that it is "this same Jesus" who was born of a Jewish virgin, and who minutely fulfilled the things written in the scroll of the book, in reference to Messiah's sufferings and atoning death, who shall "so and in like manner" come again—that is, literally, visibly, bodily—to the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and in the clouds of heaven, even as the disciples saw Him go up into heaven.

And this is the hope, not only of the Church, which is His body, consisting of the whole blessed company of the redeemed,—whether those who through the ages have fallen asleep in Him, or those who shall be alive and remain till the day of His appearing, who shall only be perfected together "in that day,"—but of Israel and the nations; for then Israel's long night of weeping shall end—the true "King," even Jehovah Jesus, shall be "in the midst of them," and the many great and precious promises in reference to Messiah's reign, and the time of peace and blessedness for this earth, shall be fulfilled.

One great and blessed consequence of His judgments which shall then be abroad in the earth, and of His coming to dwell in the midst of Zion, is that the original purpose of God in the call and election of Abraham and his seed—namely, that in them all the families of the earth shall be blessed—shall be fulfilled: "And many nations shall join themselves unto Jehovah in that day, and shall be My people; and I will dwell in the midst of thee; and thou shalt know that Jehovah of hosts hath sent Me unto thee." Yes, when the Lord in His mercy shall rebuild Zion, and appear in His glory, "then the nations shall fear the name of Jehovah, and all the kings of the earth His glory" (Ps. 102:13-22). And not only shall they fear Him, but they shall willingly "join themselves unto Him"—the word being the same as that used of the "son of the stranger" who shall "join himself" to the Lord "to serve Him, and to love the name of Jehovah" (Isa. 56:3-6); and of Israel themselves, who in that day "shall join themselves to Jehovah in a perpetual covenant which shall not be forgotten" (Jer. 50:4, 5).

During the present Dispensation, through Israel's temporary "fall," salvation has come to the Gentiles, and the "diminishing of them" has been overruled of God to "the riches of the Gentiles." But this "salvation" and "riches" extend only to individuals. God has visited the "Gentiles" to "take out of them a people for His Name." It is only ignorance of God's plan, and self-delusion, which can boast of the gradual conversion of the world and of "Christian nations" in this present age. And even the partial blessing now experienced by the Gentiles has been brought to them, not only indirectly and passively (through Israel's unbelief), but directly and actively through those "who were of faith" in the chosen nation.

Through individual Jews whose hearts were set on fire with love and devotion to Jesus of Nazareth whom their nation despised and rejected, who went forth into the world, taking their lives in their hands, to preach Him among the Gentiles; and through the inspired writings of Jewish apostles and evangelists—individuals from all nations—a multitude which no man can number have been, and are being, brought into the knowledge and fellowship of their Messiah. What might have been if the nation, as a nation, instead of rejecting, had accepted Christ, we can only guess and speculate about.

"Judging from the work accomplished by one Jew, Paul," says a Hebrew Christian brother in a recent ably-written work, "we can imagine what might have been achieved if the intellectual acumen (sharpness of mind) and great learning of the scribes and Pharisees, together with the enthusiasm of the young patriotic zealots, had been enlisted in the cause of spreading Messiah's Kingdom in the world. If, instead of one Paul, there were thousands of Pauls. If the great learning, industry, and spiritual zeal which for centuries has been employed in rearing that great monument of wasted human industry, the immense literature of the Talmud, were used rather in the living work of propagating the gospel of Christ! If Jerusalem, instead of Rome, had remained the capital of Christendom, and the Jew, instead of the Greek and Roman, the guiding spirit in the councils of the Church!" (Max Green)

But our human "if" does not reach deep enough to fathom God's inscrutable purposes, nor is it high and broad enough to unravel all the thoughts and hidden counsels of the Infinite and Eternal One. This, however, we do know, that while Israel is held responsible for its rejection and present attitude to Christ and the gospel, that unto God all things were known from the beginning of the world, and that it was clearly forecast on the prophetic page that so it would be; it is only "after these things?" when Messiah returns to build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen, and builds again the ruins thereof, and sets it up, that the residue of men shall seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom His name shall then be called" (Acts 15:13-18).

Then, when "all Israel shall be saved"; when the miracle of a whole nation being born in a day shall first be witnessed on the earth in the case of the Jews; when the full significance of the precious Name "Immanuel" shall be realized in Jesus "dwelling in the midst" of His own people, so that the name of Jerusalem from that day shall be "Jehovah Shammah" (Ezek. 48:35); when there shall at last be not only "thousands of Pauls," but a whole nation who shall burn with the same love and zeal for the glorious Person of their Messiah, and for the extension of His Kingdom, which characterized the blessed apostle to the Gentiles, who in so many respects is the type (foreshadow) of His nation,—then nations, as nations, "shall join themselves unto Jehovah," and the day of which prophets and psalmists sang, and for which they yearned, the day of universal peace and righteousness, when God's way shall be known in all the world, and His saving health among all nations, shall at last break on this earth.

But even when all nations of the earth shall walk in the light of Jehovah, the special position of Israel, as God's peculiar people on the earth, shall still be made manifest. "And Jehovah shall inherit Judah His portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again": which reminds us of Isa. 19:25, where we read that even after the blessing comes to the saved of the nations whom Jehovah of hosts shall bless, saying: "Blessed be Egypt, My people, and Assyria, the work of My hands," He will still say of Israel, "Mine inheritance," for the Lord's inalienable "portion" from among all the other nations of the earth "is His people, Jacob is the lot of His inheritance" (Deut. 32:9); in which respect, again, Israel nationally is the type (foreshadow) and counterpart of the Church, which, made up of saved individuals from among all men, is "the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints" (Eph. 1:18).

The expression al admath Jtaqodesh—"in the holy land"—is very beautiful, and reminds us of the fact that the land also which has been defiled and polluted, perhaps, above all others, shall then be cleansed of its defilement, and hallowed and sanctified by the presence of Immanuel, to correspond with the people who are to inhabit it; who throughout their future existence on the earth shall be known and called by all other nations as "the holy people" (Isa. 62:12), on whose persons and homes and possessions, down to the very "bells of the horses," shall be written qodesh layehovah—"Holiness (or 'holy') to the Lord."

The words, "and shall yet choose Jerusalem again," so to say, "round off" the glorious promises in this chapter, and are the second of a threefold reiteration by Zechariah of Isa. 14:1. The meaning, as already explained in my notes on the First Vision, is, that Jehovah shall then, by the various acts of lovingkindness to His people and to the land, which are enumerated in this prophecy, demonstrate in the sight of the whole world the fact and the immutability of His original choice of them.

The first cycle of these wonderful "visions" ends with the most solemn announcement of the great fact which forms the climax of all prophecy, namely, the visible appearing of Almighty God in the person of the Messiah as the Judge and Redeemer of men: "Be silent, all flesh, before Jehovah; for He is waked up out of His holy habitation" (Zech. 2:13 KJV).

The present Dispensation is the period of God's long-continued silence. How wonderful, how long, how deep, how mysterious, is this silence of God ever since the sound of the last words of Christ, "Surely I come quickly," and the inspired echo and response, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus," died away on the barren rock of Patmos nineteen centuries (now twenty centuries) ago! How often have the hearts of God's people grown impatient under the strain! How often has not the Church cried, "How long, O Lord, how long?" But there has been neither audible voice, nor sound, nor any visible interposition on the part of God. Moreover, while God has remained "silent," man has taken the opportunity of "speaking," and his words are becoming ever more foolish, arrogant, and blasphemous against the Most High; but "our God cometh and shall not keep silent" and then it will not only be the turn of "all flesh" to keep silent, but to stand in solemn awe while "out of his own mouth" man shall be judged, and all his thoughts and words which spell out his own condemnation are set in order before him.

But not only the ungodly and the sinners who have spoken "hard things" against God and His Anointed, but men in general, are called in a spirit of reverence and godly fear to await the solemn event announced; for the coming and visible interposition of God on this earth, while it will mean judgment to some, will mean the consummation of grace and fullness of blessedness to others; and when prophecy and vision is at last fulfilled, and "our God shall arise and His enemies are scattered, and they also that hate Him shall flee before His face"—then, also, "the righteous shall be glad, they shall exult before the face of God, yea, they shall rejoice exceedingly." The last practical word on this Scripture to you, dear Christian reader, is, "Abide in Him," that when He shall appear (when He shall be manifested) we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming.

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

The tribulation is past, and Christ has come back to His people Israel, "to dwell in your midst" (Zech. 2:10) and to be "the glory in her midst" (Zech. 2:5). Christ will reign with Israel upon the earth for 1000 years. How do the Gentiles fit into this 1000 year reign of Christ on the earth?

Isa. 56:3-6 Jer. 1:4-8

Zechariah 3:1-10

The fourth and fifth visions form a new chapter in this series of symbolic prophecies, which, though in a sense standing by themselves, are in the true psychological order, and in the closest possible relation with the wonderful things which had already been unfolded before the prophet's spiritual sight. "The good words, and comfortable words" (1:13), which formed the message in the first three visions, contained the promises, not only of the overthrow of the Gentile world-powers "who lift up their horn to scatter Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem" (1:18-21); not only of the restoration of the still-dispersed people to Palestine, and of the future enlargement and prosperity of the Promised Land, and of the Holy City, which shall then be inhabited as villages in an open plain "for the multitude of men and cattle therein" (2:4); but of the restored spiritual relationship between God and His people, and of the return of the glory of the personal Presence of Jehovah in the Person of Messiah, for evermore to dwell in their midst, the result of which would be that "many nations shall be joined to Jehovah in that day" and be His people, and the whole earth be made to know the immutable fact and gracious purpose in His election of Judah and Jerusalem as His peculiar "portion" (2:5, 10, 11).

But the question might well have suggested itself to the prophet's mind, How can these things be? Has not Israel by his grievous sins and moral defilement forever forfeited his place and made himself unfit to be again Jehovah's sanctuary and appointed minister of blessing to the nations?

As if in answer to this probable inward questioning, this fourth vision is shown to the prophet, from which he might learn for himself and communicate to the people (1st) the blessed fact that the fulfilment of the exceeding great and precious promises in reference to Israel's future, rests, not on their own merits or worthiness, but on the immutable purpose of Jehovah, who in His sovereign grace hath "chosen Jerusalem"; and (2nd) how the moral problem will be solved, and the sinful, defiled people be yet made, not only fit to be the sanctuary of the Holy One, but to be "the priests of Jehovah" and "the ministers of our God" in relation to the other nations, in accordance with His original purpose in their call and election: "Ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests and an holy nation" (Ex. 19:6; Isa. 61:6). In brief, this vision depicts in a symbolic but very graphic manner the inner salvation of Israel from sin and moral defilement, answering to their outward deliverance from captivity and oppression set forth in the preceding three visions.

A somewhat similar thought is expressed in the 3rd chapter of Jeremiah, where, after a series of sublime promises of the restoration and conversion of "backsliding Israel," and how "at that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of Jehovah, and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of Jehovah to Jerusalem," the question is asked: "But I said, How shall I put thee among the children (who art so unchildlike) and give thee a pleasant (or 'delightsome') land, the goodliest heritage of the nations?" (who hast forfeited all claims on God's favor). Then there follows the answer: "And I said, Ye shall call Me 'my Father,' and shall not turn away from following Me." "I said . . . ye shall": for what in His eternal counsels He has purposed, that His grace and power shall yet accomplish in His people, and Israel shall yet, not only be blessed, but be fitted to be the instrument in God's hand to spread abroad the blessings of their Messiah's gospel throughout the earth.

But now to come to the exposition of the fourth vision:

"And he showed me Joshua the high priest standing before the Angel of Jehovah, and Satan standing at his right hand to be his adversary?"

It cannot be decided with certainty whether the subject of the verb "showed" was Jehovah, or the interpreting angel, but most probably it was the Lord Himself, as the office of the interpreter was not to introduce but to explain the visions. "Joshua" was, of course, the high priest who returned with Zerubbabel at the head of the first colony of 49,697 exiles from the Captivity some sixteen years before.

He was standing before the Malakh Jehovah, whose divine character shines out in this vision in a most striking manner, and whose identity with the "Angel of His Face," the Second Person in the blessed Trinity, who in a special sense is the Sent One of the Father, we have already seen.

The words 'omed liphnei, "standing before," whether in relation to man or God, express attendance upon, and when used of the priests, and especially of the high priest, is almost a technical term for their priestly ministry and service. Thus we read that the tribe of Levi was separated "to stand before Jehovah, to minister unto Him, and to bless in His Name."

But it is important at the outset to note that it is not in his individual or personal capacity that Zechariah beholds the high priest "standing" thus before the Angel of Jehovah—an erroneous supposition which has led some commentators into absurd and fanciful guesses as to the nature of the guilt of which Joshua stood accused—but as the type and representative of the nation.

This is brought out first by the emphasis on his official title, ha-kohen ha-gadol, the high priest; secondly, from the fact that the plea of the great Advocate, and His answer to Satan's accusations in the 2nd verse, is made, not on behalf of Joshua, but for "Jerusalem" which, as in so many places, stands not only for the city but for the people; and thirdly, from a comparison of the 4th verse with the 9th, from which we see that the words addressed to Joshua, "I have caused thine iniquity to pass," are meant to set forth the blessed fact that God "will remove the iniquity of that land in one day."

Standing thus as the high priest and mediator of the people, it is the nation of Israel which is on its trial. If he is rejected, they are rejected; if he is justified, they are accepted.

The scene, then, to make free use of words of another writer, may be imagined as follows: "The high priest is in the sanctuary, the building of which had already commenced, and is engaged in some part of his priestly duty or prayer for mercy (on behalf of the people). The 'Angel of Jehovah' comes down and condescends to appear in the temple, as a proof of His favor, attended by a company of angels (vs. 7). Satan, the sworn enemy of the Church of God, looks on with jealous eyes, . . . and prepares to interrupt by his accusations." But, while this is in the main true, the fact that Satan was there to accuse invests the symbolic transaction, which is here presented to the prophet's spiritual sight, with a judicial character, and the high priest may be regarded also as "standing" on his trial before the Angel of Jehovah as Judge.

Ha-Satan, which, with or without the definite article, is a proper name for the Evil One, is the same who in the New Testament is described as our "adversary" the devil, the Hebrew term having etymologically the sense of "enemy," or "adversary," and the Greek that of "accuser."

He is represented as standing at Joshua's "right hand," which is supposed by many to have been the usual position of the accuser in judicial procedure, the ground of the conjecture (for there is no positive proof of such a custom among the ancient Jews) being Ps. 109:6, where we read, "Set a wicked man over him, and let an adversary ('Satan') stand at his right hand." Another suggestion is that Satan took the place usually taken by the protector (Ps. 16:8, 109:31, 121:5), "to show that Joshua, or those he represented, had none to save them, and that he himself was victorious." The passage itself, however, tells us clearly that he stood there "I'sitno"—to act as adversary, or "be Satan," to him—"that he," as an old writer observes, "who is called Satan, might thus fill up the measure of his name."

Here we are brought face to face with one of those mysteries of revelation which must be classed among the things which "we know not now," nor can as yet fully understand—namely, the position of Satan in God's economy in general, and his relation to the moral government of this world, and to man in particular.

How and why, we may not yet fully know, but the fact is clearly brought before us in Scripture that the great adversary of God and man is permitted to appear before God, not only in His earthly courts of the temple, as in this vision, but in heaven, as "the accuser of the brethren."

And it is especially in his role as the accuser that the fiendish nature of the "old serpent" is brought out. It was he who brought sin into the world; it is he who deceives men and nations, and spurs them on to sin and rebellion against God; and yet, when the seduction is accomplished, he turns round and becomes their accuser—this truly is like himself.

But it is not merely his malice against Israel which brings him here as their accuser before God in the person of their high priest. Oh no; it is first and foremost his hatred of God, and his desire, if possible, to frustrate the accomplishment of God's purposes of mercy for this world, which, as he so well knows, are bound up with Israel. It was for this same reason that he sought all through the centuries to rouse the fury of the nations against them, with a view, if possible, to bring about their extermination.

The actual words of Satan's accusations are not given, but their nature may be inferred from the 3rd verse, where we read: "Now Joshua was clothed with filthy garments; and stood before the Angel"

The word tsoyim, which is found only here as an adjective, is the strongest expression in the Hebrew language for filth of the most loathsome character, and the garments so defiled denote the sins of the people as viewed by the Holy One, in which the high priest as their representative stood, so to say, clad in His presence. Satan, therefore, might well have sought the rejection of Israel as the priestly nation, or to impugn the holiness of God's character in receiving the worship and services of those so morally defiled.

But, blessed be God, the adversary may accuse, but it is not in his power to condemn. He that sitteth as Judge, to justify or condemn, is the Lord. And note, it is the Divine Angel Himself, who in the 2nd verse is expressly called "Jehovah," who pleads the cause of His people. Well might the remnant of Israel say, therefore: "He is near that justifieth; who will contend with me? Let us stand together; who is mine adversary? Let him come near to me. Behold, the Lord God will help me; who is he that shall condemn me? Behold, they all shall wax old as a garment; the moth shall eat them up" (Isa. 50:8, 9)—a challenge which is thrown down still more triumphantly in the New Testament in the words, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God; who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. 8:33, 34). Satan's malice and hatred against the Church and the individual believer in Christ is as great as it is against Israel. And he still appears as "the accuser of the brethren," before God and before our own conscience; but with such an "Advocate with the Father" as "Jesus Christ the Righteous," who has Himself become "the propitiation for our sins" (1 John 2:1, 2), we need fear neither his fury nor his malicious accusations. Is Satan's hatred of us great? The love of Jesus is greater. Is Satan ever on the watch and restlessly walking about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour? Behold, He that keepeth Israel doth neither slumber nor sleep, and His eyes run to and fro throughout the earth to prove Himself strong on behalf of those whose hearts are perfect towards Him, and His myriads of blessed angels are sent forth specially to guard and to be ministering spirits to them who shall be heirs of salvation. Therefore we may continue the Apostle's song of triumph: "Who shall separate us from the love of God? . . . for I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

But to return to the context. The great Advocate bases His plea on Israel's behalf, first on the ground of Jehovah's immutable choice. "Jehovah rebuke thee, O Satan."

The verb yig'ar, from ga'ar ("to rebuke," "to reprove"), "when applied to God, who accomplishes all things by His own power, includes the idea of actual suppression"; and in this case it "involved a withering rejection of the blasted spirit and his accusations, as when Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit and he departed out of his victim." The reason follows, "Yea, Jehovah that hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuke thee" as much as to say, "Shall God cast away His people which He hath foreknown?" (Rom. 11:1). And this is the best answer that can ever be given to the accusations of man or devil, directed either against Israel, or the Church, or the individual Christian. It is the answer which Paul gives in that section of his Epistle to the Romans which was indicted for the express purpose of instructing Gentile believers in God's mystery with Israel: "I say, then, hath God cast away His people?" He shudders at the very thought, as inconsistent with the character of God, Who must abide true though all may prove liars, and whose gifts and calling of His people are without repentance (or "change of mind") on His part—"By no means," or "God forbid," he exclaims.

Yes, if Israel's position as the Lord's peculiar people depended on their own faithfulness, then there would have been an end of them long ago; but Israel's hope and safety rest on the immutable character and faithfulness of the everlasting, unchangeable God, and that makes all the difference. Why did God choose Israel in the first instance? Was it because of their righteousness or their loveliness above all other peoples? Oh no! "Jehovah did not set His love upon you, nor choose you," He tells them through Moses, "because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people." "Not for thy righteousness or the uprightness of thine heart, but because Jehovah loved you, and because He would keep the oath which He hath sworn unto your fathers." A truly wonderful and God-like reason. "He chose you because He loved you; and He loved you because He loved you" the sole ground and motive being in His own heart of love, and in the sovereign purpose of grace which He hath formed in and through them.

And having known and foreknown them—yea, with all their many and grievous sins and backslidings, and purposed in His heart to exhibit in and through them, not only His holy severity (as now in their unbelief), but even in a more wonderful way His infinite grace and goodness, and all the attributes of His character for the blessing of all the nations of the earth, He can never wholly cast them off.

Some of my readers may have visited the Wartburg and had pointed out to them the black spot on one of the walls of the room which Luther occupied during his benevolently intended imprisonment. The legend connected with it is this. One night during this mournful solitude, when suffering from great depression, because, as he himself expresses it in a letter to Melancthon, dated May 24, 1521, "I do see myself insensible and hardened, a slave to sloth, rarely, alas! praying—unable even to utter a groan for the Church, while my untamed flesh burns with devouring flame"—the great Reformer dreamt that Satan appeared to him with a long scroll, in which were carefully written the many sins and transgressions of which he was guilty from his birth, and which the evil one proceeded to read out, mocking the while that such a sinner as he should ever think of being called to do service for God, or even of escaping himself from hell. As the long list was being read, Luther's terrors grew, and his agonies of soul increased. At last, however, rousing himself, he jumped up and exclaimed: "It is all true, Satan, and many more sins which I have committed in my life which are known to God only; but write at the bottom of your list, 'The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin,' " and grasping the inkstand on his table he threw it at the devil, who soon fled, the memorial of it being left in the ink-splash on the wall.

We are always reminded of this story when reading anti-Semitic literature, or listening to accusations and disparagements of the Jewish people. No too-black a picture can ever be drawn of Israel's backslidings and apostasies; no human lips can ever sufficiently describe the heinousness of Israel's sins and transgressions. All that can therefore be said against their past or their present is true. But when you have read through your long indictment against Israel, write at the bottom of your list words such as these: "Thus saith Jehovah, If heaven above can be measured, and the foundation of the earth searched out beneath, I will also cast off all the seed of Israel, for all that they have done, saith Jehovah" (Jer. 31:37); or words taken from the very chapter which foretells in advance Israel's many sins and apostasies, and the terrible calamities which should come upon them in consequence: "And yet, for all that, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break My covenant with them, for I am Jehovah, their God" (Lev. 26:44). No, "Jehovah will not forsake His people, for His great Name's sake, because it hath pleased Jehovah to make you His people"—in which faithfulness of the God of Israel to the nation which He has chosen for His own inheritance, in spite of all its unworthiness, you may see a picture, dear reader, of His faithfulness to you, and a pledge of your eternal safety in Christ.

Secondly, the Angel of Jehovah bases his answer to Satan's accusations on the ground of the sufferings in punishment of their sins which Israel has already endured. "Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" This same figure, with one slight variation, is found in Amos 4:2, and is used (as Hengstenberg well explains) to "denote the occurrence of great misfortune, which, however, is prevented by the mercy of God from issuing in utter destruction." It need scarcely be pointed out, after what has already been stated, that these words also must not be taken as applying to Joshua as an individual, but as the high priest, the type and representative of his people. The fire out of which Joshua had been rescued as a brand was neither the evil which had come upon him through neglecting the building of the temple (as some German expositors explain), nor the guilt of allowing his sons to marry foreign wives (which the Jewish Targum, followed by Rashi and Kimchi, oblivious of the anachronism, assert); for, as Keil well observes, in the former case the accusation would have come too late, since the building of the Temple had been resumed five months before (Hag. 1:14 compared with Zech. 1:7); and in the latter case it would have been much too early, since these misalliances did not take place till fifty years afterwards. No; the words are used by the Great Advocate of the whole people, against whom, as we have already seen, the adversary's accusations were really directed, and their general sense has been well given by one of the earliest Church Fathers—namely, "As if He should say, Israel confessedly has sinned, and is liable to these charges; yet it has suffered no slight punishment; it has endured sufferings, and has scarce been snatched out of them, as a half-burned brand out of the fire. For not yet had it shaken off the dust of the harms from the captivity; only just now, and scarcely, had it escaped the flame of that most intolerable calamity. Cease, then, imputing sin to them on whom God has had mercy." (Cyril)

But though primarily the figure refers to "the fire" of the Babylonian Captivity from which the restored remnant at the time had been plucked as a "brand," the words are designed also to remind us of a deeper and more general truth in connection with Jewish history. Israel may be said to be always in the fire, yet God never permits them to be wholly consumed. Like the burning bush, the symbol of this indestructible people—it may burn, and must suffer by very reason of its being in a special sense the dwelling-place of the Holy One, until all its dross shall have been consumed; but it cannot be destroyed.

When God first made His covenant with Abraham, the symbols of His presence, which were meant to foreshadow His whole future dealings with them, were "a smoking furnace and burning lamp," or "flaming torch" (Gen. 15:17). Already in Egypt they found themselves in an "iron furnace" (Deut. 4:20), and from the human point of view there was every reason to believe that they would be wholly consumed; but along with and in the midst of the furnace of the four hundred years' "affliction," there was suspended the flaming torch of promise that God would ultimately interpose on their behalf, and judge the nation who was oppressing them, and bring them out "with great substance" (Gen. 15:13, 14).

Babylon was another such furnace, and though a remnant had, according to God's promise, after the seventy years, been plucked out "as a brand from the fire," we have to remember that the Babylonian Captivity, in a very important sense, still lasts, for it inaugurated the prophetic period called "the times of the Gentiles" which will only be brought to a close when the kingdom is restored, and governmental power over the earth is centered in Mount Zion. But in this longer captivity also, in this more fiery "furnace of affliction" (Isa. 48:10), God has not left His people without the burning lamp of promise that they shall never be wholly consumed; that He will never forget the Covenant which He made with their fathers; but that He would be with them even when they walk through the fires (Isa. 43:2); and in the end, when their sufferings reach their climax in the great tribulation, when the filth of the daughter of Zion shall finally have been purged away "by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning," He would save them as "a brand from the fire," and cause them to multiply and to be a blessing to all the world.

If we may digress for a moment from the interpretation of this familiar figure, and its primary significance in relation to Israel, and make an application of it to the individual believer in Christ, we would remind the reader, first, that we have a picture here of what, and where, we were in our natural condition. It is true, as Keil contends, that "fire is a symbol of punishment, not of sin," but in a very real and terrible sense sin is its own punishment; and apart from "the everlasting burnings" (Isa. 33:14) which await the impenitent in that place where "the fire is never quenched," wickedness (already in this life) burneth as a fire (Isa. 9:18). And this, whether we have been conscious of it or not, has been the case with us all. We were in the fire which indwells our nature, and, but for the mercy of God, we should have ultimately been altogether consumed by it.

But, secondly, the figure also reminds us of the love and compassion of our Redeemer, Who, when there was no eye to pity, at the cost of infinite suffering to Himself, plucked us "as brands from the fire," and delivered us, not only from the punishment of sin in the future, but from the power and dominion of sin in the present.

But to proceed with the exposition. As already indicated, "the filthy garments" in which Joshua was clad symbolized the sin with which the nation as a whole was defiled, and which he, as high priest, represented in his official capacity. This was already clearly perceived by the church father whom I have already quoted, who observes: "The high priest having been thus taken to represent the whole people, the filthy garments would be no unclear symbol of the wickedness of the people; for clad, as it were, with their sins, with the ill-effaceable spot of ungodliness, they abode in captivity subject to retribution, paying the penalty of their unholy deeds." (Cyril)

The figure of the filthy garments as emblematic, of moral pollution is also carried over into the visions of Zechariah from the former prophets. Thus in the confession of the remnant of Israel in Isa. 64:6 we read: "For we are all become as one that is unclean, and all our righteousnesses are as a polluted garment; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, take us away." This is a true picture of Israel's moral condition before God. But in contrast to the past and the present there are other pictures painted for us by the prophets of Israel's future, based on the fact of God's election of this nation to be a peculiar people unto Himself, and on the exceeding great and precious promises given to the fathers. The Lord shall wash away "the filth of the daughter of Zion," and cleanse her from all her defilements, "and it shall come to pass that he that is left in Zion, and he that remaineth in Jerusalem, shall be called holy, even every one that is written among the living in Jerusalem" (Isa. 4:3, 4; Ezek. 36:16-32). Then, in contrast to the "polluted garment," the same prophet sings: "I will greatly rejoice in Jehovah, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decked himself with ornaments (or, 'with his priestly head-dress' or 'turban'), and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels" (Isa. 61:10).

Now this same glorious truth, so clearly announced in verbal prophecy, is here realistically set forth to Zechariah in symbol. The symbol, however, is immediately interpreted by the Angel of Jehovah Himself, who, after commanding the attendant angels "who stood by," saying, "Take away the filthy garments from him," addresses the comforting words to Joshua himself: "Behold I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee" (which, as already pointed out, answers to the glorious promise in vs. 9: "I will remove the iniquity of the land in one day"), "and I will clothe thee with rich apparel"; which, in brief, answers to the garments of salvation and pure robe of Messiah's own perfect righteousness, in which Israel shall then be attired.

But the word machalatsoth, which is in the plural, translated in the Authorised Version "change of raiment," and in the Revised "rich apparel"—and which is found elsewhere only in Isa. 3:22, where it is used of the "changeable suits of apparel" which the haughty daughters of Zion of that time reserved to be worn on great occasions—probably stands here for the specifically priestly or high priest's outfit; and these being put upon Joshua as the representative of Israel would indicate, not only pardon and justification before the Lord, on the ground of the righteousness which He Himself provides for His people, but their reinstatement and reconsecration to their priestly calling as a nation. And this, it seems to me, is brought out still more clearly in the 5th verse.

The prophet has hitherto been a silent but eager spectator of the wonderful scene which he was made to witness, but as he beholds the transformation which had taken place in the high priest's outfit, after the filthy garments were taken from him, and as the symbolical character of the transaction becomes clear to him in its very process (since he does not in this vision ask for any explanation of its meaning, nor is there one given to him by the interpreting angel), he bursts out in the prayer that the gracious work may be completed: "And I said, Let them set a fair (or 'clean') mitre upon his head"—which prayer, being in accordance with the good pleasure of Jehovah, and that for which it asked having apparently been omitted only in order to leave something, and that the completion of all, to be done at the intercession of the prophet, it is also immediately answered, "So they set a fair mitre (literally, 'the mitre, the clean or fair one') upon his head?"

Now the word tsaniph (rendered "mitre") is not "a turban such as might be worn by anybody" (as Koehler and other commentators assert), but is, as Keil rightly explains, "the head-dress of princely persons and kings," and is here used as a synonym for mitsnepheth, which is the technical word for the tiara prescribed for the high priest in the law.

And this mitre, or turban, was the glory and complement of the high priest's sacred and symbolical attire—the portion of his dress "in which he carried his office, so to speak, upon his forehead" (Keil); for to it was attached the plate of pure gold with the words—qodesh layehovah! "Holy to Jehovah," engraven on it. "It shall be always upon his forehead," we read, "that he may bear the iniquity of the holy things which the children of Israel shall hallow, . . . that they may be accepted before the Lord" (Ex. 28:36-38). The answer, therefore, of the prophet's prayer, and the putting of the fair mitre upon Joshua's head, signified in his own case his full equipment and fitness for his high-priestly functions; and in relation to the people, the removal of their guilt, and an assurance of their acceptance before the Lord.

But we have also to remember that the Aaronic priesthood, summed up as it was in the person of the high priest, while appointed to meet Israel's felt need of a mediator between them and God, was at the same time designed not only to foreshadow some of the aspects of the everlasting priesthood of Him Who ever liveth to make intercession for us, but to be also a continual reminder of God's purpose with the nation as a whole, and, symbolically at least, ever to keep before them the significance of priesthood, which is to be "chosen"; to be "His," in a peculiar sense; to be "holy," and to "draw near" unto Him in priestly service and intercession (Num. 16:5).

To the ultimate realization of God's original purpose in the election and call of His people, that they should be unto Him "a kingdom of priests and an holy nation" (Ex. 19:5, 6), the prophetic Scriptures bear unanimous testimony; and the wonderful transformation which Zechariah is permitted to witness in this vision, in the case of Joshua, symbolically sets forth the same great truth, and describes the change which will come over Israel as a nation, and their equipment in that day when they shall be named throughout the earth "the priests of Jehovah," and when men everywhere shall call them "the ministers of our God" (Isa. 61:6).

And the process which the prophet witnesses in the case of Joshua as the representative of the Jewish nation, answers also to the experience of each individual believer.

By nature, dear reader, "we are all"—whether we be Jew or Gentile—"as one that is unclean" in God's sight, and "all our righteousness"—the very best moral outfit which we can manufacture for ourselves—is, "as a polluted garment" (Isa. 64:6), not only of no avail, but, together with our sins, must be "taken away."

Man, in his own name, and on the ground of his own merits, has no approach and no standing in the presence of God—he must find his moral fitness outside of himself if he desires to "ascend into the hill of the Lord, and to stand in His holy place."

There must first be a stripping of self. Like the great and blessed apostle, we must each one be brought to say: "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea verily, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for Whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in Him, not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God through faith" (Phil. 3:7-9).

From the very beginning of the history of redemption we have the same truth set forth under the same figure. Already in the garden of Eden, as soon as sin entered into the world, and man, losing the consciousness of God, became self-conscious, we read of the man and the woman that "they sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves aprons." These "aprons" or "girdles" which men continue to sew or "weave" for themselves (Isa. 59:6) are of no avail to hide their shame or to cover their misery. But already then, God in His infinite compassion began to preach the gospel to man by direct promise, and to set it forth also by type. He not only announced the coming of "the Seed of the woman," who should bruise the serpent's head and destroy the devil and his works (Gen. 3:15), but Jehovah God, we read, also "made for Adam and his wife coats of skins (from animals which He probably first commanded the man to slay) and clothed them" (Gen. 3:21).

And these two "garments"—the one symbolic of the getting together for fellowship with God, which man tries to work out for himself, and the other of the beautiful robe of Messiah's own righteousness which is provided for all who, conscious of their own utter unworthiness to appear in His presence on the ground of anything in themselves, look for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life (Jude 21)—are contrasted throughout Scripture until the day when the "wedding feast" which the Great King made for His Son, to which men are now invited, merges into the "marriage of the Lamb" and "the great supper of God." Then there shall be a final scrutiny and separation between those arrayed in "fine linen, bright and pure" and clothed in "festal attire," and those who refused to put on the wedding robe provided by the King, because they deceived themselves, or made belief to think that their own "polluted garment" was good enough: these shall then be bound hand and foot and cast into outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Matt. 22:1-14; Rev. 19:6-18).

And this "robe of righteousness," which is ours first of all by faith, and which is the only ground of our standing before God, becomes also a blessed subjective experimental reality to the Christian.

In this world men walk in a vain show, and there is often no inward correspondence between their actual character and the robe of office which they wear. There are kings who are not kingly, princes who are by no means princely, and priests who are far from being priestly; but it can never be so in the kingdom of God—in it there are no deceiving appearances. As many as are justified in Messiah's righteousness are also being regenerated and sanctified by His blessed Spirit, and there is not one arrayed in the beautiful robe of His perfection who does not also make it the aim of his life to perfect holiness in the fear of God now, and who shall not in the end be conformed to His image, and be actually and fully like Him in character.

And what Israel shall be nationally in the day when, stripped of their own filthy garments, they are clothed in machalatsoth (the new priestly outfit), and, with the fair mitre with qodesh layehovah on their foreheads, go forth as "the priests of Jehovah" and as "the ministers of our God" among the nations—that also all believers in Christ are already now as individuals. We, too, are "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession," and are sent forth into the world, not only with our lips, but also in our lives and conduct, "to show forth the praises (the excellences) of Him Who hath called us out of darkness into His marvellous light."

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Explain who Joshua in Zechariah 3:1 represents.

Zech. 3:5, 9

Who is it that has been plucked from the fire in Zechariah 3:2?

Deut. 4:20 Isa. 43:1-7

Explain Joshua's filthy garments and the rich robes and clean turban put on his head in Zechariah 3:3-5.

Isa. 64:6

Use Scripture to show who the "Branch" is spoken of in Zech. 3:8.

Isa. 4:2 Jer. 23:5, 6 Zech. 6:12

Use Scripture to show who the "stone" is spoken of in Zech. 3:9.

Ps. 118:22 Isa. 28:16

Use Scripture to explain the "seven eyes" spoken of in Zech. 3:9.

Zech. 4:10 Rev. 5:7

What is the "one day" spoken of in Zech. 3:9-10?

Zech. 2:11 Zech. 12:10-14 Zech. 13:1

Zechariah 4:1-14

As stated in the introduction to the 3rd chapter, the fourth and fifth visions form a new chapter in this series of symbolic prophecies, which, "though in a sense standing by themselves, are in true psychological order, and in the closest possible relation with the wonderful things which had already been unfolded before the prophet's spiritual sight." We there saw that the fourth vision depicts in a symbolic but very graphic manner the inner salvation of Israel from sin and defilement, answering to their outward deliverance from captivity and oppression set forth in the preceding three visions.

We feel it, however, necessary, even at the risk of being guilty of repetition, to cast once more a brief retrospective glance at the progressive unfolding of God's counsel in relation to Israel, and the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom, in the series of visions which we have already considered.

The first three visions were meant to convey to the prophet, and through the prophet to the people, the "good and comfortable" assurance that God had neither cast off nor forsaken the people which He hath foreknown; that, though they found themselves under the oppressive yoke of Gentile world-power (which was true of the remnant which had returned as well as of the bulk of the nation which was still in the far land of the Captivity), the Angel of the Covenant was in their midst, identified with them, and pleading their cause (1:8-12). Jehovah Himself, far from being indifferent to their sorrows and sufferings, is very angry with the nations who are helping forward the affliction (1:14, 15), and wishes it to be proclaimed that he that toucheth them "toucheth the apple of His eye" (2:8). These Gentile world-powers "who lift up their horn" to scatter and oppress "Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem," would be broken and cast out (1:18-21); the beloved city should be rebuilt on a much grander scale, and according to plans and measurements devised by God Himself, Who would henceforth be her Light and her Defence—"a wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst of her" (2:1-5).

And not only Jerusalem, but the whole land, shall experience the blessed effects of Jehovah's "return to His people with mercies," and its cities shall spread abroad and overflow with material prosperity and with the multitude of men and cattle which shall be found therein (2:4). The name of the city from that day shall be Jehovah Shammah; and thus the first cycle in this series of visions ends with the joyous proclamation: "Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord" (2:10).

And the blessed consequence of Israel's return to the land, and of the return to the glory of Jehovah, for evermore to dwell in the midst of His people, will be that the original purpose of God in the call and election of Abraham and his seed—namely, that in and through them all the families of the earth should be blessed—shall be fulfilled. "And many nations shall join themselves to the Lord in that day, and shall be My people, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that Jehovah of hosts hath sent Me unto thee" (2:11).

But the question might have suggested itself to the prophet: How can these things be? Has not Israel, by her grievous sins and moral defilement, forever forfeited her place, and made herself unfit to be again Jehovah's sanctuary and appointed minister of blessing to the nations?

As if in answer to this question, the vision in the 3rd chapter is shown to the prophet, from which he is to learn (1) that the fulfilment of "the good words and comfortable words" of promise, rests, not on Israel's merits or worthiness, but on the immutable purpose of Jehovah, Who, in His free sovereign grace, hath "chosen Jerusalem," and Whose gifts and calling are without repentance.

(2) The solution of the moral problem, how the Holy One can dwell in the midst, and accept and use the ministry of those who are defiled by sin, is realistically presented to the prophet in the transformation which he witnesses as taking place in the case of Joshua, who stands before the Angel of Jehovah, not in his private capacity, but as the high priest and representative of the people.

Like the filthy garments in which their representative had been clothed, so shall the Lord remove the moral filth of the daughter of Zion, and cause her iniquity to pass away in that "one day" when her eyes shall be opened to behold the glorious Person and atoning work of her Messiah, who, in allusion to the prophecies in the second half of Isaiah (especially chap. 53), is called "My Servant," and also by the well-known Messianic title, "The Branch" (3:8).

Thus, clothed in the righteousness of Him, Who "by His knowledge makes the many righteous," and arrayed in the "rich apparel," or festal attire of priestly garments, with the high-priestly mitre, to which was fastened the plate of gold with Qodesh la-Yehovah on his head, Israel shall be fitted, not only for fellowship with Jehovah, but to go forth on the mission for which she was originally chosen and destined, namely, to disseminate the truth and the blessings of Jehovah among the nations. Now, in beautiful order of sequence we have the vision in ch. 4, which presents to us Israel as the Light of the world.

The Fifth Vision

We shall now give an explanation, first of the symbolism of this vision; and, secondly, of the message.

The Symbolism (verses 1-5)

A brief pause had intervened, during which the prophet was lying probably in a state of ecstatic slumber still contemplating the wonderful things he saw and heard in the last vision; or Hengstenberg may be right in regarding the prophet's "sleep" as a return to his ordinary conditions of life in comparison to the spiritually wakeful state in which he was when receiving the visions. If so, then we have here, as he suggests, "the deepest insight into the state in which the prophets were, during their prophecies, as compared with their ordinary condition. The two bear the same relation to each other as sleeping and waking. A man's ordinary state, in which he is under the control of the senses, and unable to raise his spiritual eye to the contemplation of Divine objects, is one of spiritual sleep; but an ecstatic condition, in which the senses with the whole lower life are quiescent, and only pictures of Divine objects are reflected in the soul, as in a pure and untarnished mirror, is one of spiritual waking."

Being thus wakened by the interpreting angel, and his powers of spiritual vision stimulated by the question, "What seest thou?" he looks, and beholds a candlestick, all (of it) of gold, with a bowl, or oil vessel, "at the top of it" (indicating that it is designated as a fountain of supply for the candlestick), with seven (mutsaqoth) "pipes," or little canals (literally "pourers"), connecting this vessel with each of the seven lamps on the candlestick.

On either side (i.e., one on the right and one on the left of the bowl) were two olive trees, each with a specially fruitful bough, or branch, which, as Kimchi puts it, "were full of olives, as ears are full of grain," and are therefore called Shibalei hazethim—"ears of olives"—which poured golden oil from themselves, by means of two "spouts" or channels, into the vessel, for the supply of the candlestick.

On the prophet's asking, "What are these, my lord?" the Interpreter answers, "Knowest thou not what these be?" as much as to imply that the symbolism of this vision was such that the prophet might himself have been able to interpret had he understood the symbolism of the tabernacle and temple.

As a matter of fact, neither the Interpreter nor the Angel of Jehovah explain the symbolism of this vision, but only indicate the message which it conveyed to Zerubbabel at that time, and to the people of God generally in all time.

The candlestick itself—the central object in this vision—is doubtless a figurative representation of the seven-branched candlestick in the temple. There it stood in the Holy Place (the figure of heavenly places not made with hands), not only as the emblem and representation of what the whole redeemed family shall finally be "when in union with their risen, glorified Lord they shall for ever shine in the sanctuary of God," but also as typifying Israel's high calling in relation to the other nations.

In his midst a great light had shone—the light of the self-revelation of the glory of Jehovah—not only for his own illumination, but that he might be the candlestick, the light-bearer, and light-diffuser all around.

It is for this reason that "when the Most High gave to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the children of men, He set the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the children of Israel" (Deut 32:8).

We know how terribly and sadly Israel failed to respond to God's purpose concerning Him. "Thus saith the Lord God"—through His prophet Ezekiel, in ch. 5 of his prophecy—"This is Jerusalem: I have set her in the midst of the nations, and countries are round, about her"—that she may shine as a light in their midst, so that these nations and countries may see of her good works and glorify God,—But she hath changed My judgments into wickedness more than the nations, and My statutes more than the countries that are round about her: for they have rejected My judgments, and as for My statutes, they have not walked in them"

Often did God in effect threaten Israel through the prophets to remove his candlestick; but in His long-suffering for a long time, even after the sceptre, the emblem of governmental power, had been removed, the candlestick—which is the emblem of Israel's religious or ecclesiastical position as witness for God in His corporate capacity—was not taken away till the cup of his national iniquity was filled up in the rejection of Him who is the "Light of light," for the diffusion of which this very candlestick was formed, and in their final resistance of the Holy Spirit. Then the Kingdom of God was taken from them and "given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

On the disappearance of the candlestick from Israel, the seven golden candlesticks come into view as representing the new people of God, the Church of this dispensation planted on the earth, that during the period of Israel's blindness and darkness it might fulfil Israel's mission of shining before the Lord in His sanctuary, and letting its light stream out into the night of the world's darkness: the seven as representing the Church, instead of the one as representing Israel, is not without significance.

The seven Christian ecclesiae selected by the Lord out of the many Christian assemblies which already then existed even in that one pro-consular province of Asia, to be symbolized by the seven golden "luchniai" (lampstands), are meant to represent the one Church of Christ through all time, and in all places, during the present dispensation. It has not, like Israel, one earthly centre, and cannot be presented as an absolute unity. The seven are all mutually independent as to external order and government, yet were they meant to be one in the unity of the Spirit, under the one headship of Christ. But not only in relation to the Lord and to one another, but also in relation to the world outside, did the Church of Christ, as originally constituted, possess both a local and a catholic unity. "The first," to quote a great master now with the Lord, "was symbolized by each of the candlesticks regarded individually; the second by all the seven collectively. At Ephesus, for example, all the saints who dwelt in that city were gathered into visible communion with each other. All light was with them; everything else in Ephesus was darkness; and therefore one candlestick fitly represented their condition. There was one point of concentrated light. But what each Church was in its own locality, that all the Churches unitedly were to the world around them. They were together separated; had a common calling and service; were alike one to the other; were ordered and nourished by the same hand. This was catholic unity, symbolized by the seven candlesticks standing together with the Lord in their midst. The proper unity of the Church is gone if either of these be wanting." (B. W. Newton) How glorious was the Apostolic Church in its original purity and lustre! How brightly did it shine! And how rapidly did it disseminate its light! Thus the Apostle Paul, for instance, writing to the Thessalonians only such a very brief while after the Church in that city was founded by him, could say: "From you hath sounded forth the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but in every place your faith to Godward is gone forth, so that we need not to speak anything" (1 Thess. 1:8).

But how long did this beautiful condition of things continue? Already in the lifetime of the Apostles, germs of corruption began to manifest themselves, and they have continued ever since to develop; and though the long-suffering of God manifested in His dealings with Christendom has been as great, and even greater, than in His dealings with Israel, He has had, nevertheless, to remove from His sanctuary, one by one, the candlesticks of Gentile Christianity, and to disown them in their corporate capacity from being witnesses for the truth and representatives of Christ on the earth.

The history of corporate Gentile Christianity is not as the shining light that "shineth more and more unto the perfect day," as some who boast in the supposed progress and speak of the conversion of the world before the glorious appearing of Christ ignorantly suppose, but rather that of a bright dawn, developing into an increasingly dark and cloudy day, and ending in blackness of darkness. And there is no hope for Christendom which continued not in the goodness of God when once it is "cut off"; nor is there any promise of the restoration and relighting of its candlestick when once its light has been quenched in anti-Christian apostasy. But it is different with Israel. There is always hope in her end.

Not only shall the scepter of governmental rule and the kingdom come back to the daughter of Jerusalem, after the long centuries of subjugation and oppression, but her candlestick, too, shall be restored after the long period of Israel's spiritual darkness and blindness, to shine in more resplendent glory than even in the past. This is the meaning of Zechariah's fifth vision, and it sets forth in symbol the great truth proclaimed by the former prophets in relation to Israel's future glory as the centre of light and blessing to all the nations of the earth, as, for instance, in Isa. 60:1-3: "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of Jehovah is risen upon thee. For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the peoples: but Jehovah shall arise upon thee, and His glory shall be seen upon thee. And nations shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising"; and Isa. 62:1, 2: "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until her righteousness go forth as brightness, and her salvation as a lamp that burneth. And the nations shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory; and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of Jehovah shall name."

That the light of Israel's restored candlestick will shine on throughout the millennial period in undiminished purity, and in greater—yea, in sevenfold brilliancy as compared with the past—is, I think, indicated by the additions to the candlestick in this vision as compared with the original in Exodus.

In the Tabernacle, in keeping with the Mosaic dispensation, the continuity of its light depended on the offerings of the people, who were commanded to bring "pure olive oil, beaten for the light; to cause a lamp to burn (lit., to ascend) continually"; and on the ministry of Aaron and his sons, who had to fill, and trim, and order, and light them every morning and evening (Ex. 27:20, 21, 30:7, 8); but in our vision no attendant priests are necessary, nor offerings of oil from the people. The lamps are fed spontaneously from the gullah, or oil vessel, above the candlestick, the plentifulness of the flow of oil (emblematic of the abundant outpouring of the Holy Spirit) being set forth by the seven pipes (or "pourers"), which carried the supply to each.

There is yet one item in the symbolism of the candlestick which requires our attention—namely, the two olive trees (vs. 3), or "sons of oil" (vs. 14), which, by means of the two tsanteroth, or spouts, empty golden oil out of themselves into the gullah, or bowl.

Many fanciful interpretations have been given of this part of the vision, which, for lack of time and space, we will not stop to examine, but it is most in harmony with the scope of these visions (one of the great objects of which was to encourage the two heads, or leaders, of the restored remnant of the nation in their task of rebuilding the temple) to regard the olive trees as representing Joshua the high priest, and Zerubbabel the prince. These were the two persons by whom the whole covenant people was then represented, and through whom it, in a very important sense, received the grace and the promises of God.

The words, "These are the two that stand before the Lord of the whole earth" must also lead us to the same conclusion. In the previous vision (3:1), which is so closely connected with that we are considering, Joshua is thus represented as "standing" before the Angel of Jehovah; and in ch. 4 it is Zerubbabel who is specially mentioned by name. It is fitting, therefore, that in the end the two who are so often mentioned together by Haggai and Zechariah should again be represented together in their united ministry. Though differently occupied, the one in more particularly "religious," and the other in civil duties, they both stand (intent on their ministry) before the Lord of the whole earth.

But, while in relation to the remnant of Israel at that time, and to the temple then in building, we are to understand by these two "sons of oil" the actual persons of Joshua and Zerubbabel, it is certain that these two, considered merely as individuals, do not exhaust the symbol for the simple reason that the supply of oil for the candlestick in a vision designed to describe the abiding, and especially the future position and mission of the congregation of Israel, could not be represented as dependent on the lives of two mortal men. They must therefore be viewed standing here as the types or representatives of the kingly and priestly offices to which they respectively belonged—the only two orders (with the one other exception of the prophetic) which could properly be designated by the term "sons of oil," because of their being originally consecrated for their office by the ceremony of anointing (with oil), by which act they were, so to say, appointed as the media through whom "the spiritual and gracious gifts of God" were to be conveyed to His Church.

And both these divinely-appointed offices and functions in Israel, we must remember, were from the beginning designed to shadow forth what should ultimately be united in Him who, as set forth by Zechariah himself (6:13), would be "a Priest upon His throne"—the true and everlasting great High Priest, of whom Joshua and the whole order of the Aaronic priesthood were "men that were a sign" (3:8); and the just and ideal King (9:9), of whom the kingly function in Israel was also a type and prophecy. It is in His light, and by means of the golden oil of His Spirit, which shall then be shed upon them abundantly, that Israel's candlestick shall yet shine with a sevenfold brilliancy for the illumination of all the nations of the earth.

The Message (verses 6-10)

The contemplation of God's determinate counsel and the glimpse of Israel's future glory are to serve as a stimulus and encouragement to the leaders and people in the then present.

The prophet having with humility confessed his ignorance of the true import of the symbolism, the interpreting angel answered and said: "This (vision in as far as it embodies a prophecy) is the word of Jehovah unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith Jehovah of hosts?" The word hayil ("might"), which also means an "army," or "host," probably stands for the strength of many; while ko'ach, stands for that of one man. The two might be taken to express human strength and power of every description—physical, mental, and moral—individual, or the combined strength of the multitude. All of themselves can neither advance nor retard the accomplishment of His purpose. The real motive power by which Israel's mission, as set forth by the candlestick, shall eventually be fulfilled, namely, "My Spirit, saith Jehovah," must be the only resource also of Zerubbabel in the prosecution of the task of rebuilding the temple which shall be the visible proof and symbol of the restored fellowship between Jehovah and His people, and hence an indispensable preparation for the accomplishment of Israel's mission as the light of the nations.

Now this Almighty Spirit of Jehovah "of Ts'bhaoth" was now present, dwelling in the midst of the returned remnant of the people; for, in effect this message through Zechariah is but an amplified reiteration of the word of Jehovah to Zerubbabel and his companion by the mouth of Haggai about four months before: "Be strong; for I am with you, saith Jehovah of hosts, according to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so My Spirit remaineth among you: fear ye not" (Hag. 2:4, 5), which again (as is characteristic of all the notable utterances of the post-exilic prophets) is based on a great word of Jehovah through one of the former prophets, namely, Isa. 59:21: "As for Me, this is My covenant with them, saith Jehovah: My Spirit that is upon thee, and My words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seeds seed, saith Jehovah, from henceforth and forever"

Relying only on God's Spirit, "the great mountain"—whether we understand it as a figurative expression for "the colossal difficulties, which rose up mountain high" and of the hindrances which were then in the way before the building could be completed; or, with the Jewish Targum and Kimchi, and some eminent Christian interpreters, as the symbol of Gentile world-power, which is the real obstacle to the restoration of the theocratic kingdom, before Zerubbabel, as the instrument of God's Almighty Spirit—shall be turned into "a plain"; and he, who some fifteen years before was permitted amid great demonstrations of joy, not unmixed with sobs and tears, to lay the foundation (Ezra 3:8, 13), shall yet bring forth the "headstone," accompanied by shoutings of joy and admiration, "Grace, grace (is) unto it!"

In vs. 8-10 we have, so to say, a corroborative message from the mouth of the Malakh Yehovah, of the explanation given to the prophet by the angelic interpreter:

"Moreover the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying, The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house; his hands shall also finish it"; which, so far as the temple which they were then building was concerned, was, as we know, fulfilled about four years after the prophesying of Haggai and Zechariah, namely, "on the third day of the month Adar, which was in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king" (Ezra 6: 14, 15); but the words, "And thou shalt know that Jehovah of Ts'bhaoth hath sent me unto you" (which, as appears clear from a comparison with ch. 2:9, must be ascribed, not to the angelus interpres, but to the Malakh Yehovah), show that the promise was not exhausted then, but that the work on which Zerubbabel was engaged is regarded as a type and pledge of the sure fulfilment of that which was set forth by the symbolism. The last words of the message sound a special note of encouragement to the dispirited remnant.

Toward so great a consummation the work they were then engaged upon might seem insignificant. Indeed this feeling had been one of the chief causes of the slow progress made in the work of building the House, and disposed them only too readily to yield to the opposition of their enemies, and for a time to desist from their task altogether, till Haggai and Zechariah were raised up "to prophesy to them in the Name of the God of Israel" (Ezra 5:1, 2).

When its foundation was laid, in the midst of the great joy which accompanied it, "many of the priests, and Levites, and chief of the fathers, which were ancient men," when they saw the modest dimensions, and remembered the very limited resources at their command, "wept with a loud voice, . . . so that the people could not discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping of the people" (Ezra 3:10-13).

Even in comparison with the glory of the first House which had been destroyed, the one that was then building "was as nothing in their eyes" (Hag. 2:3); but particularly in relation to the greater glory of their restoration and of the future House predicted by the former prophets, which should become the centre from which the light of Jehovah should stream forth to all the nations, the actual circumstances in which they then found themselves must have seemed indeed "a day of small things." Yet from God's point of view the task of the rebuilding on which they were then engaged was—because of its being a necessary step toward the fulfilment of His purpose as set forth in the symbolism of the candlestick—the greatest and most important thing in the world, and formed the center and motive of His providential dealings on the earth at that time. Not on the great world-movements, but on the little "stone of lead" or "plummet" in the hand of Zerubbabel, who is thus indicated as superintending the work of building, do the seven eyes of God's special providence rest with complacency and joy; and as those eyes run to and fro through the whole earth, and nothing is hid from His omniscience, He will see to it that nothing from without shall now prevent the work being brought to a happy completion.

This is "the word of Jehovah unto Zerubbabel"; but as we look more closely at the message we seem to see the lineaments of Zerubbabel melt away into the features of the true Prince of the House of David, and the task on which he was then engaged merge into the building of the true "temple of Jehovah" by "the Man whose name is The Branch," as set forth by the prophet in chapter 6. Messiah, the true Son of David, shall not only be the real builder of the future literal Temple, which through the millennial period shall be the center of the true worship of Jehovah on this earth, and the House of Prayer for all nations; but also of the much more glorious mystical building, which through eternity shall be for the habitation of God through the Spirit. Of this spiritual Temple He is Himself the "sure Foundation," the precious Corner-stone and Head-stone of the Corner, as well as the Master Builder.

Nineteen centuries ago, in His life of suffering, death of atonement, and glorious resurrection, the foundation of that temple was laid. Since then living stones, both Jewish and Gentile, from all parts of the earth are being gathered by His Spirit, and "the building fitly framed together" is growing toward completion; but the exceeding magnificence and the spiritual glory of this mystical Temple will not be manifested until, at the glorious appearing of our Lord Jesus, the Head-stone is, so to say, brought forth, and Christ is for ever joined with His Church.

Then, when covered with the beauty of her Lord, and made perfect in the comeliness which He shall put upon her, there shall be shouting of joy and admiration, not only by men, but by the hosts of heaven, "Grace, beauty, loveliness (is) unto it!" Hen, Hen, lah!

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What are the five visions given so far?

What do the lampstands and candlesticks in Zechariah 4:2 represent and why do the candlesticks shine so brightly?

Ex. 25:37 Rev. 1:12 Rev. 4:5

Who or what do the two olive trees represent in Zechariah 4:3?

Rev. 11:3-4

What is the meaning of Zechariah's fifth vision of the lampstand and olive trees?

Zechariah 5:1-4

The first five visions are indeed prophecies "of Hope and of Glory." They abound, as we have seen, in most glorious promises of restoration and enlargement, of temporal and spiritual prosperity and blessing—promises which, in their full and exhaustive sense, are yet to be fulfilled, when "Jehovah shall arise and have mercy upon Zion," and yet again "choose Israel."

But before that longed-for day of blessing can at last come; before the beautiful symbolism of the fifth vision shall at last be realized, and Israel's restored candlestick shall once again, and in greater splendor and purity than ever before, shed abroad the light of Jehovah throughout the millennial earth—both the land and people must be cleansed from everything that defileth, or worketh abomination, or maketh a lie. This is the import of the dark episode unfolded in the two visions in the 5th chapter, which we are now to consider.

The God of Israel has two methods in dealing with sin and removing iniquity, both of which are in perfect accord with the absolute holiness of His character. One of these methods—the one He delights in—is the method of grace. This is beautifully unfolded in the 3rd chapter, where we are shown how that, on the ground of His sovereign immutable "choice" (vs. 2), and because of the full atonement and perfect righteousness accomplished by His Righteous Servant, "The Branch," the iniquity of that land shall be removed "in one day," and repentant Israel (upon the Spirit of grace and supplication shall in that day be poured) shall be cleansed from all defilement (as signified by the removal of the "filthy garments") and clothed in "rich apparel," and with the "fair," or "clean," mitre on his head, on which the words Qodesh la-Yehovah—"Holy to Jehovah"—are graven, shall be fitted to go forth among the nations as the priests of Jehovah and the ministers of our God.

But what about those who persist in their wickedness, and, in spite of the marvellous display of God's grace, "will not learn righteousness," but continue even "in the land of uprightness" (as Immanuel's land shall then be called) "to deal unjustly, and will not behold the majesty of Jehovah" (Isa. 36:10)? With them God's method is that of judgment. Sin must be purged away, iniquity must be stamped out in the city of God; and when the sinner is so wedded to his sin that he is no longer separable from it, he becomes the object of God's curse, and must be "cleansed away" from the earth. In short, then, the two visions in ch. 5 give us the reverse side of the truth unfolded in the first four chapters.

They show us that if there is grace and forgiveness with God, it is not in order to encourage men to think lightly of sin, but that "He might be feared" (Ps. 130:4). They also take us, so to say, a step backward, and show us that, before the glorious things symbolically set forth in the first five visions will finally be fulfilled, a period of moral darkness and corruption, and of almost universal apostasy, was yet to intervene.

The Flying Roll

But now for a brief exposition of the sixth vision.

The prophet having for a season been absorbed in meditation on the wonderful things which had been presented to him in the last vision, "turns" himself, his attention being very probably called anew by the interpreting angel—and, lifting up his eyes, sees a roll twenty cubits in length and ten cubits in breadth flying in the air. On addressing a silent look of inquiry to his angelic instructor as to the meaning of this strange sight he is told, "This is the curse that goeth forth over the whole land," etc.

The megillah, "roll" or "scroll," as the emblem of a message or pronouncement of solemn import from God to man, is used in other scriptures. Thus, in Ezek. 2:9,10 we find a strikingly parallel passage: "And I looked, and behold an hand was put forth unto me; and, lo, a roll of a book (megillath sepher) was therein; and he spread it before me, and it was written within and without: and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe"

The megillah which Zechariah beheld was also "spread" out, or open, else its dimensions could not have been seen; and it also was written "within and without," as may be gathered from the words "on this side and on the other side, according to it" which I take to be the most satisfactory rendering of the Hebrew mizzeh kamoah, which is twice repeated in vs. 3.

The same was true of the tables of the law, of which the same words are used to describe the fact that "they were written on both sides: on the one side and on the other (mizzeh-u-mizzeh) were they written" (Ex. 32:15).

What was written on this roll may be gathered from the words, "This is the curse" ha-alah (answering to the "lamentations and mourning and woe" of Ezekiel's megillah)—which might refer to the awful catalogue of curses which Moses foretold would come upon Israel in case of their disobedience, recorded in Deut. 28:15-68, and which in ch. 30:1 of the same book are spoken of in the singular as "the curse"

But it seems to me more satisfactory to regard the word as describing in a more general way the curse which the law as a whole contains within itself—the sequel, so to say, to the breaking its commands expressed in a solemn sentence: "Cursed be he that confirmeth not the words of this law to do them"

It is true that only two transgressions are here specified for which their perpetrators are to be pursued and overtaken by the curse—namely, perjury and theft; but these two are most probably mentioned as samples and summaries of the whole. For the expression "everyone that sweareth" must be understood as explained in the 4th verse, as "swearing falsely by the Name of Jehovah" and is thus a violation of the Third Command, which is found in the first table of the law which summarises man's duty to God; and "everyone that stealeth" breaks the Eighth Commandment, which is found on the second table, which summarises man's duty to his neighbor. So that Baumgarten and Hengstenberg are not far wrong when they write that one side of the roll contained the judgments of God against the transgressors of the Command, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might"; and on the other the judgments against the transgressors of the Command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Against all such the megillak, with its awful contents, "goeth forth" being set in motion (as we see from the 4th verse) by "Jehovah of hosts"; and is therefore seen "flying"—that is, travelling rapidly over the whole land, and signifying the swiftness with which the judgments of God shall finally overtake the wicked.

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What is the meaning of the sixth vision, the flying scroll?

What is God demanding of Israel?

How does "and be sure your sin will find you out" (Num. 32:23) fit into these verses?

Lev. 14:45 Isa. 59:13 Amos 3:2

Zechariah 5:5-11

We now come to the second of the two visions contained in the 5th chapter, which, together, set forth the full and final removal, not only of the guilt of sin, but of sin itself (especially in its final and yet future form of "wickedness" or lawlessness)—and that by means of judgment—from off the "holy land," and from the very presence of His redeemed and purified people.

After instructing the prophet as to the meaning of the preceding vision, the Interpreting Angel had again withdrawn for awhile, and the prophet was left to himself to meditate on the solemn significance of the Flying Roll. Then the angel "went forth" (probably from the choirs of angels among whom he had retired in the interval, as Pusey suggests), and telling the prophet once more to lift up his eyes, he beholds another object, which the Angel tells him is "the ephah (basket) which goeth forth" and adds the enigmatical words: "This is their resemblance (lit., 'their eye') in all the land"

As the prophet looks, the cover, consisting of a circular mass, or "talent," of lead, was lifted up, and he beheld a woman (lit., "one woman") sitting in the midst of the ephah, of whom the angel said, pointing to her: "This is the Wickedness." As there is evidently an attempt on the part of the woman to get out, or escape, the angel casts her down into the midst of the ephah: "And he cast the weight (lit., 'stone') of lead upon the mouth thereof."

Then the prophet saw two women with wings like the wings of a stork "coming forth" from the invisible, and the wind was in their wings, and they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven. On his inquiring of the angel: "Whither do these bear the ephah?" the answer was: "To build her an house in the land of Shinar: and when (or 'if') it be prepared (or 'established') it shall be set there upon her own base"

Let me now try very simply to explain the various items in this vision in the order in which they occur in the text.

(a) The ephah, the same as bath, was the largest measure for dry goods in use among the Jews, though there is still some difference of opinion as to its exact size and capacity. The most general interpretation of this symbol—the one which I myself have previously held—is that it signified the (full) measure of Israel's sins, beyond which there is to be no more forgiveness, but a carrying away, or banishing from the land, or (as some interpreters will have it) from "the earth." Thus, already one of the Church Fathers, quoting the solemn words of our Lord, "Fill ye up the measure, of your fathers" says: "The measure, then, which the prophet saw pointed to the filling-up of the measure of the transgression against Himself" (Cyril); and another says: "The angel bids him behold the sins of the people Israel heaped together in a perfect measure, and the transgression of all fulfilled, that the sins which escaped notice one by one, might, when collected together, be laid open to the eyes of all, and Israel might go forth from its place, and it might be shown to all what she was in her own land." (Jerome)

A somewhat similar interpretation is given by Kliefoth (who is followed by Keil and others), who says: "Just as in a bushel the separate grains are all collected together, so will the individual sinners over the whole earth be brought into a heap when the curse of the end (contained in the Flying Roll) goes forth over the whole earth."

But, though it is a solemn truth that God allows evil fully to develop itself, and iniquity to fill up its full measure of guilt before He finally interposes in judgment, the usual interpretations quoted above overlook the fact that the ephah instead of being represented as the measure into which the people pile up their iniquities, is spoken of as itself "going forth" (the same expression as is used of the Flying Roll in vs. 3) to pervade the people with its influence, and to stamp upon it, so to say, its own characteristic features, so that "this shall be their appearance ('their aspect,' or 'resemblance') in all the land."

If we ask ourselves what was this new power, or principle, which exercised such a mighty formative influence over the Jewish people ever since the Babylonian Captivity, and which is gradually also bringing all the other nations of the earth under its sway, the answer is trade or commerce, of which the ephah is the natural emblem.

With their banishment to Babylon and subsequent dispersion and peculiar position among the nations, there not only began an altogether new period of Jewish history, but there commenced also the processes by which the bulk of the nation became gradually transformed from an agricultural and pastoral people into a nation of merchantmen, and the new occupations into which they were forced by the altered circumstances tended in a peculiar sense to develop the two transgressions (namely, theft and perjury) which are specified in the preceding vision of the Flying Roll, with which this vision of the Ephah stands very closely related. Idolatry, into which they were so liable to fall, was forever left behind in Babylon; but a godless commercialism, with its temptations "to make the ephah small and the shekel great, and to deal falsely with balances of deceit" (Amos 8:5), eventually becomes not less hateful to God—not only because it has too often been supported by theft and perjury, which, as we have seen, are transgressions of the central commands of both tables of the Law, but because it was destined to develop a new system in which all iniquity would finally be summed up.

(b) In conjunction with the ephah we have the kikar, which the English Version renders "talent." The Hebrew word literally means "a circle," and thus kikar lehem, "a circle of bread," is used to denote a round loaf. (Ex. 29:23, 1 Sam. 2:36)

The word, as Dr. Wright points out, is not elsewhere found in the signification of a cover, though that is a possible sense. "It is constantly used of a fixed weight, by which gold, silver, and other things are weighed and measured, and is naturally spoken of in such a meaning here in connection with the Ephah, as the latter was the usual measure of capacity. The talent was the largest measure of quantity, and the weight was made of lead as the most common heavy metal, and was used in all commercial transactions for weighing out money."

That a "talent," the other chief emblem and instrument of trade, should have been seen by the prophet as forming the cover of the ephah, is of solemn significance, as will be shown further on.

(c) The "talent," or circular mass of lead, being lifted, the prophet beheld a woman sitting in the midst of the ephah.

"And he said" (i.e., the Angel, as if to call anew the prophet's special attention), "this is the Wickedness"—the very embodiment of iniquity, rendered in the Septuagint, lawlessness.

The woman is usually taken by commentators to symbolize the Jewish people, which, when the measure of sin shall have become full, would be carried away into captivity. But the seventy years' captivity in Babylon was now at an end, and the idea of a retrospective significance of the symbolism of this vision, which Jerome and Rosen-muller adopt, seems to me untenable. All the other visions of Zechariah relate to the future—as Hengstenberg well observes, why should this be the sole exception? In the judgment of the Flying Roll a coming judgment is foretold. Why should this one of the Ephah be referred to the past?

Neither can it be properly referred to the subsequent captivity, as Hengstenberg and others attempt to do. There was, indeed, another dispersion of the Jewish people after the restoration from Babylon, but that could not well be represented in any special sense as a carrying away "into the land of Shinar." Besides, as I have tried to show in the introductory remarks to the exposition of the preceding vision of the Flying Roll, the scope and purport of the two visions in ch.5 are not the punishment of the nation, but the cleansing of the restored people and land, and the stamping out and banishment from their midst not only of the guilt of sin, but of iniquity or "wickedness" itself.

We regard, therefore, the woman in this vision, not as a personification of the Jewish people, nor as a collective representation of individual sinners who are finally gathered into one heap in the ephah, but as delineating the (then as yet hidden) moral system of which the ephah is the emblem.

And it is not inappropriate that the system engendered by the ephah, which in its essence is the worship of Mammon, should be represented by a woman, "because of the power it displays as a temptress, whereby it exercises such an enticing and dangerous influence over the souls of men." Or, as Grotius observed: This form of wickedness is here described as a woman "because she is the mother of thefts and perjuries, and of all crimes." But though this vision, like all the rest, has primary reference to the land and the people—and the purport of its message is that the system which is characterized as the Wickedness (and is altogether alien and opposed to the principles of the redeemed and sanctified community in the land in which the King of Righteousness shall have His seat) shall be banished to the place, or sphere, to which it originally belongs—it is a solemn truth that this same evil power of the ephah, with its all-pervading controlling influence, is "going forth" also in the whole world; so that of all the civilized nations in particular it must be said: "This is their aspect, or resemblance, in all the earth."

It is a striking and noteworthy fact, which no intelligent man can fail to observe, that commerce is more and more bringing the nations under its sway.

It now sets up the governments and dictates the policies of the nations. It is for it that the mighty armaments are being built and that wars are being made.

In all the earth and among all nations that which is symbolized by the ephah is becoming the great controlling centre of society. "The producing power of manufacture, the distributing skill of the merchant, the controlling power of those who trade in money and command the circulating medium of commerce—these and similar interests, when combined, are able to speak with a voice which no government can refuse to hear. Their will is potent. Legislation and government accommodate themselves to their demands."

The Angel's action in throwing the woman back into the ephah, and casting the circular mass of lead "upon the mouth thereof," is meant, I believe, to set forth, not only the fact that the instruments of sin become the instruments of her punishment, but the still more solemn truth that men and nations who sell themselves to sin are, after a time, kept down and tied to that particular sin; or, to use the language of Prov. 5:22: "His own iniquities shall take the wicked, and he shall be holden with the cords of his sin"

Not only in relation to the future eternal destiny of the individual (of which the words are primarily used), but already also in the earthly history of men and nations, there comes a time when the solemn judicial sentence goes forth from the mouth of God: "He that is unrighteous, let him do unrighteousness still: and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still" (Rev. 22:2, R.V.).

Thus, when the woman attempts to escape, she is thrown back into the ephah, which becomes, so to say, the chariot in which she is carried away as something which is defiled and defiling, from the land in which God shall dwell; and the talent with which she carries on her unrighteous trade becomes the heavy weight by which she is held down till she is landed safely "in her own place," where, after a season of lawless liberty in which she will allure men to their own destruction by her seductive attractiveness and luxury, she will be judged and destroyed, together with him who is pre-eminently styled "The Wicked One," by the brightness of the Lord's parousia (2 Thess. 2:8).

(d) We come now to the last act in the drama of this vision, which, as already said, is primarily intended to set forth the removal of "wickedness" from the holy land without occupying itself with its final destiny in the land to which, by the aid of evil powers, it was for a time to be transplanted.

That every item in the description of the actors in the 9th verse is of symbolical significance (as is the case with all the details in the other visions), and not merely picturesque figures of speech with a view "to give distinctness to the picture" (as Keil, Hengstenberg, Bredenkamp, and others assert), there can be no doubt; but it is impossible to speak with absolute positiveness as to what each particular is intended to signify.

In a general way I agree on this point with those writers who regard these women as typifying instruments or systems of evil, who for a time deliver the woman in the ephah from the vengeance which was about to destroy her. "By reason of the curse described (in the previous vision) as overtaking all who followed in her wicked ways," observes Dr. Wright, "no place is left for her any longer in the land of righteousness, among a people whose transgressions are forgiven and who are sanctified to bring forth fruit unto holiness. The winged women, therefore, bear off the evil one to the land of Shinar, there to build for her a home and a house."

And if we are asked what two evil systems, helped and impelled by evil spirits (as may be gathered from the fact that they had the wings of a stork, which is an unclean bird, and that "the wind," or "spirit," certainly not of God, "was in their wings"), would thus eventually unite in finding a home for the ephah and the woman, which for a season would be permitted to dominate the nations through its power, we can only suggest that it may be apostate Christianity united in the last days to apostate Judaism, and both given over to the worship of Mammon, on which the power of the ephah is based; or, as in these series of visions, the civil and ecclesiastical powers, as represented by Zerubbabel and Joshua, are frequently brought before us; and in the fifth vision (ch. 4:14) are probably "the two" who are represented "as standing before the Lord." The two women here may, perhaps, be meant to signify civil government broken loose, even outwardly, from every acknowledgment of God (and, therefore, an instrument in the hand of lawlessness), and a corrupt anti-Christian and anti-theistic priesthood—both Jewish and Gentile—ready to unite as sponsors and protectors to a system which, though as yet not so regarded, even by the elect, is characterised by God as "the Wickedness."

(e) There is yet one more point that we must briefly touch on before taking our leave of this vision—namely, what are we to understand by "the land of Shinar," which, according to the words of the Interpreting Angel, is to be the destination to which the two women bear the ephah, there for a time to establish it on its own base? According to the commentators, the name "Shinar" is not to be taken geographically here, as an epithet applied to Mesopotamia, but "is a national, or real, definition, which affirms that the ungodliness carried away out of the sphere of the people of God will have its permanent settlement in the sphere of the imperial power that is hostile to God." Or, as another explains it: "The name Shinar, though strictly Babylonia, carries us back to an older power than the world-empire of, which now was destroyed. In the land of Shinar first attempt made, ere mankind was yet dispersed, to array a world-empire against God. And so it is the apter symbol of the anti-theistic or anti-Christian world, which, by violence, and falsehood, and sophistry, wars against the truth." (Pusey)

But while there is truth in the words of yet another writer that Shinar was the land of unholiness, and stands here contrasted with Palestine, which shall be "the holy land" (ch. 2:12), and that the chief point in the vision is the renewal of the special form of "wickedness" which is symbolized by the ephah from the land of Israel to find its resting-place "in the land of world-power which is antagonistic to God," we cannot altogether agree that "the picture is an ideal one," and that "the land of Shinar is an ideal land contrasted with the land of Israel." (Dr. C. H. H. Wright)

Without any spirit of dogmatism, and without entering at this place into the question of the identity and significance of the Babylon in the Revelation—whether mystical or actual—we would express our conviction that there are Scriptures which cannot, according to our judgment, be satisfactorily explained except on the supposition of a revival and yet future judgment of literal Babylon, which for a time will be the center and embodiment of all the elements of our godless Western "civilization," and which especially will become the chief warehouse and distributing point of commerce in the world, in which will be gathered "merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stone, and pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet; and all thyine wood, and every vessel of ivory, and every vessel made of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble; and cinnamon, and spice, and incense, and ointment, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and cattle, and sheep; and merchandise of horses and chariots and bodies; and souls of men" (Rev. 18:12-13), until it shall finally and forever be overturned by one terrible act of judgment from God.

To this conviction we are led chiefly by the fact that there are prophecies in the Old Testament concerning the literal Babylon which have never in the past been exhaustively fulfilled, and that Scripture usually connects the final overthrow of Babylon with the yet future restoration and blessing of Israel.

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Describe the seventh vision of the woman in a basket.

The ephah (basket) outwardly symbolizes a false system of luxury and humanitarianism dissociated from God and the truth. How has the fulfillment of this vision or prophecy concerning the ephah progressed since Baron tried to bring it to light almost 100 years ago?

Rev. 18:12, 13

Describe the land of Shinar spoken of here and connect it with what is said in the book of Revelation about Babylon.

Rev. 18:1-24

What is the talent (cover) emblematic of and how does it fit into this vision?

Zechariah 6:1-8

We come to the eighth, or last vision, in which the prophet's eyes are opened to see the invisible chariots of God which are being sent forth for the overthrow of Gentile world-power, and to prepare the way for the Kingdom of Messiah, which "shall never be destroyed."

Probably directed again by the interpreting angel to do so, the prophet lifts up his eyes and beholds four chariots coming forth from between two mountains of brass. These chariots were drawn by horses of various colors. In the first were red horses, in the second black, in the third white, and in the fourth grisled, or speckled, horses, to which also are applied the epithet (amutsim, "strong").

1. The two mountains, which in the Hebrew have the definite article, indicating that they are well known, and which, as we may gather from the 5th verse, are associated with the "presence," or special dwelling-place, of "the Lord of the whole earth," are very probably Mount Zion and Mount Olivet, "viewed as ideal mountains, and as the place from where God's judgments go forth over the world." This is the more likely true explanation, since the Valley of Jehoshaphat (the meaning of which is "Jehovah shall judge"), which lies between these two "mountains," or "hills," is associated in the prophetic Scriptures with God's judgments upon the nations (Joel 3:2).

At any rate, this much is clear (as Dr. Wright points out), that the chariots are represented as going forth from a place situate between "north" and "south"—i.e., from Palestine, and from that place in the Holy Land where Jehovah was wont to display His gracious presence. From this spot, which God has chosen as His earthly dwelling-place, and as the centre of His governmental dealings with the nations, blessing goes forth in all the world, and from it also judgments proceed.

They are spoken of as mountains of "brass," or, more literally, "copper," to indicate the strength and inaccessibleness of God's dwelling-place. He can, and does, send forth His chariots to build up, or to pull down and destroy, but no one can penetrate into His presence. Or, as Pusey observes, "the mountains of brass may signify the height of the divine wisdom (in all His plans and purposes concerning the nations), and the sublimity of the power which putteth them in operation. As the Psalmist says: 'Thy righteousness is like the mountains of God.'"

2. The Chariots. If, with the prophet, we ask, What are these? the answer of the Interpreting Angel in v. 3 is: "These are the four winds of heaven, which go forth from standing before the Lord of the whole earth." We must therefore regard them either as ideal appearances, personifying the forces and providential acts which God often uses in carrying out His judgments on the earth, or, what seems to me the simplest and most natural explanation, angelic beings, or heavenly powers—those invisible "messengers" of His "who excel in strength, and who ever stand in His presence, hearkening unto the voice of His word," and then go forth in willing obedience, as swift as the "winds," to carry out His behests (Ps. 103:20; 21, 104:4).

These, no doubt, are also meant by "the chariots of God, which are twenty thousand, even thousands upon thousands," of which we read in Ps. 68:17, though the word "angels" (used in the Authorized Version) is not found in the original of that verse. Indeed, there is a striking connection between the first and the last visions. In the first vision (ch. 1:7-17), at the beginning of this, to the prophet, memorable night, he saw the angelic riders with the Angel of the Lord, Himself mounted on a red horse at their head, appearing in the presence of the Lord, to bring in, as it were, their report after "walking to and fro through the earth" as to the condition of the Gentile nations and their attitude to the people and the land. And now, toward morning, as the visions were about to be brought to an end, he sees the same angelic hosts, now turned into God's war chariots, actually being sent forth (no longer to report) but to carry out the judgments of God upon those nations with whom He is "very sore displeased," because "they helped forward the affliction" of His own people, whom, even in the time of their banishment and scattering, He has never cast off.

3. We now come to the difficult point of the number of the chariots and the significance of the colors of the horses.

The number, four, clearly brings to our mind again the four great Gentile world-powers, whose successive course makes up "the times of the Gentiles," and whose final overthrow must precede the restoration and blessing of Israel, and the visible establishment of the Messianic kingdom.

In this connection it is again interesting to observe that these four "chariots" are explained to be the "four winds." Now, in Dan. 7:1-3 we read of the four winds of heaven "striving," or "breaking," upon "the great sea," which caused the four great beasts, "diverse one from the other" (symbolical of the four great Gentile world-powers), to arise; and here we see the "four winds" sent forth to break up these same empires; from which we may surely learn that it is by the will and power of God, and by His direct interposition, either by visible, natural, or by angelic agency, that empires rise and fall.

There is a certain parallelism to be observed also between this vision and the second act of the historical prophetic drama unfolded in the vision of the four horns and four carpenters (Zech. 1:18-21)—only here we have the great fact still more clearly brought out, that behind visible phenomena and all human motives and actions there is the eternal purpose and power of God, and the invisible active agency of His angelic hosts.

But there is a difficulty in connection with the number of the chariots, and in the description of the colors of the horses, which we must face before proceeding further. The difficulty, briefly stated, is this: In the vision itself (vs. 2, 3) the prophet beholds four chariots, in the first of which were red horses, in the second black, in the third white, and in the fourth grisled horses, to which last is also added the epithet (amutsim, "strong"); but in the interpretation by the interpreting angel (vs. 5-7) the first with the red horses is passed over. The black and the white are explained as going forth into the north country, the grisled into the south, and then we read of the amutsim ("strong"), which in v. 3 are the same as the "grisled," wanting to go forth on a separate, or yet another mission.

We have already observed that though these four chariots, which with their horses are interpreted by the angel to be "the four winds," or "spirits," of the heavens, cannot be identified with the four Gentile world powers of Dan. 2 and 7, on which Zechariah's second vision, that of the horns and carpenters, is, as we have seen, based—they are closely connected, and primarily refer to those empires whose united successive course make up the "times of the Gentiles."

These four are the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Grecian (or Graeco-Macedonian), and the Roman. "These are the horns (or Gentile powers) which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem" (ch. 1:19), and it is the overthrow and judgment of these, by means of invisible heavenly powers appointed of God as a necessary precursor to the establishment of Messiah's kingdom, and the blessing of Israel, which is symbolically set forth to the prophet in this last vision.

But these powers, though in vision and prophecy seen together, are, as a matter of fact, successive in time.

Now, when these visions were shown to Zechariah, Babylon had already been overthrown, and its world-empire taken away, visibly and apparently, by the Medo-Persians, behind whom, however (as the prophet beholds), there was the invisible chariot of God, with its red horses of blood and vengeance.

This act of judgment on the first great Gentile world-power which had oppressed Israel and laid waste his land being already an accomplished fact (though in the 3rd verse, for completeness' sake, all the four are shown to the prophet together, as is the case in the vision of the four horns, one of which had also been already overthrown), this first chariot is passed over by the Angel in the interpretation, and is not seen among those who "go forth" in v.6—its mission, as far as the Babylonian Empire is concerned, having already been fulfilled.

The black horses, significant probably of sorrow and mourning in consequence of sore judgments to be inflicted, go forth toward the north country, and "after them," going forth in the same direction, are the white, symbolical of victory, triumph, and glory over Gentile world-power—for both the Medo-Persian and Graeco-Macedonian Empires, being each in turn successors of the great Babylonian Empire, were the great hostile northern powers in relation to Palestine.

In contrast to these who went forth to the north country, the beruddim ("grisled," or "speckled" horses)—the exact color of which it is difficult to give with certainty, but which probably answers to the seruqqim ("speckled") in ch. 1:8—go forth to the south country.

Now, the south country is Egypt, the other direction from which hostile world-power came into contact with Israel and Palestine; and "the king of the south," as, for instance, in Dan. 11, is the king of Egypt. But there it was that the fourth great world-empire came into collision with the declining Macedonian power, and that it was first brought into direct contact with the Jewish nation. It is most probable, therefore, that the fourth chariot, appointed for the overthrow and destruction of the fourth great world-empire, is seen to go forth, first to the south, as if to encounter this fresh hostile power at the point at which it first came into contact with Israel.

But the Spirit of God, foreseeing that the fourth empire, unlike its predecessors, would spread itself, not only to the north, and south, and east, but westward also, and practically embrace the whole known world; and that it would, in the different stages of its existence, endure for a considerably longer period than its predecessors—the horses of this same chariot are represented as desiring also, after having accomplished their mission in the south, to go forth to walk to and fro through the earth. "And He" (that is, the Lord of the whole earth, before whom they were all seen "standing" in the first instance) "said, Get you hence, walk to and fro through the earth," in order to meet this power in every place where it shall establish itself, to hold it in check, and to counteract its evil plans, until the signal shall be given for its final overthrow.

If we are asked why the horses in this last chariot are seen first going forth as the "grisled" or "speckled," and then, in the 7th verse, as the "strong" (which, be it noted, was the additional epithet applied to them already in the 3rd verse), the true answer is probably that suggested by Bredenkamp, who says that "speckled strong horses" are such as, regarded from the point of view of their color, are "speckled" (gefleckte), but from the point of view of their special characteristic, are "strong."

Viewed as going forth like the other chariots into a particular direction, and as encountering a particular power, they are described, like the previous ones, by their color, which is in itself symbolical; but when the fact is brought into view that this particular power which these horses are to encounter is unlike its predecessors, but will assert its dominion over the whole earth, then their special characteristic as "the strong ones" is emphasised.

To this we may add the striking fact that strength was to be an outstanding feature of the fourth great world-empire, even as we read in Dan. 7:7: "After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, terrible and powerful, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth; it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet: and it was diverse from all the beasts which were before it; and it had ten horns."

Now, over against the might of man, and of all the powers of darkness which assert themselves in this last great world power, there is the might of God; and we are reminded in this vision that His invisible hosts are a match for the mightiest, and that God is ever stronger than His foes.

We now come to the 8th verse:

"And He cried unto me, and spake unto we, saying, Behold, those which go toward the north country have quieted ('caused to rest') My spirit in the north country"

The idiom, "to cause to rest upon" a person, or, as in this case, upon a land, involves, as Pusey rightly observes, that that person (or land) is the object on whom it abides, not that the spirit is quieted in him whose it is, as some interpreters have explained it. The word (ruach, "spirit") must, I believe, be understood here as anger, in which sense it is found also in other scriptures (Judg. 8:3, Ecc. 10:4). The meaning of the 8th verse, then, is that that company of the invisible host whose mission was toward the north country caused God's anger to rest on it—i.e., "have carried it thither, and deposited it there (made it to rest upon that people or kingdom) as its abode"; as John says of the unbelieving, "The wrath of God abideth on him." (Pusey) The reason why "the north country" is specially singled out for the region on which God's anger was already resting, is to be found, perhaps, first of all in the fact that there the first great world-power—namely, the Babylonian—was already overthrown by God's judgments. Secondly, because it was probably intended as a message of comfort more directly to the restored remnant, to whom the prophet was primarily commissioned to relate the visions—to indicate, namely, that the second great northern world-power, the successor of Babylon, under whose yoke they were then groaning (Neh. 9:36-37), was already the object of God's anger, and would soon be trodden down under the feet of the horses of God's war chariot which was being sent forth in that direction.

And, thirdly, as Bredenkamp suggests, God's wrath is specially spoken of in this last vision as being caused to rest on "the north country," because not only was it there that the attempt was first made to array a world-empire against God, and where apostasy sought, so to say, to organize and fortify itself; not only did Babylon also, at a later time, become the final antagonist and subduer of God's people and the destroyer of His temple, but probably because there, "in the land of Shinar," the metropolis of world-power, Babylon, the great rival of the city of God—wickedness, as we have seen in the consideration of the last vision, will once again establish itself, and all the forces of evil again for a time be concentrated.

Then God's judgments shall be fully poured out, and anti-Christian world power be finally overthrown to make room for the Kingdom of Christ, whom the Father has invested with all power and dominion and glory, "that all nations and languages should serve Him." His dominion is an everlasting dominion, "and His kingdom shall never be destroyed."

And this, dear reader—the establishment of Messiah's throne of righteousness on Mount Zion, that from it, and Israel as a centre, His beneficent rule may extend over the whole earth and bless all peoples—is the appointed goal of history toward which all things are moving. It is the motive, also, of all God's providential dealings with the nations. "Political changes," as one has expressed it, "are the moving of the shadow on the earth's dial-plate that marks the mighty motions going forward in the heavens"; and however conflicting and confusing to our poor human judgments, they mark but the various stages of a plan and counsel which God formed from eternity.

In reference to the four great world-powers, whose successive course was to make up "the times of the Gentiles," we have to note that three of them have already long ago disappeared, in accordance with the clear predictions of Scripture, and the fourth, which (as also foreseen and foretold) was to drag on longest, is now, as is generally agreed by all students of the sure Word of Prophecy, fast approaching its very last phase of existence. We may, therefore, say with confidence that we are on the eve of the most solemn events in the world's history, and are very fast approaching "the day," not only of our own final and complete "redemption" as believers at the manifestation of Christ, but the "set time," when God shall again arise and have mercy upon Zion, and when, through the restoration and blessing of Israel, "the nations shall fear the Name of Jehovah, and all kings of the earth His glory."

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Explain what is happening in the eighth vision.

Zechariah 6:9-15

The series of eight visions is followed by a very significant symbolical transaction, which must be regarded as the crowning act—the headstone of the rich symbolical-prophetical teaching which was unfolded to the prophet on that memorable night.

It shows us what will follow the banishment of evil from the land, and the overthrow of world-power in the earth, as set forth particularly in the last three visions—namely, the crowning of the true King, the Mediator of Salvation, who shall be "a Priest upon His throne," and build the true temple of Jehovah, into which not only Israel, but "they that are far off"—the Gentiles—shall have access.

To indicate that the visions are now ended, the prophet adopts the usual formula by which the prophets always authenticated that they spake, not of themselves, but as they were moved by the Holy Spirit: "And the word of Jehovah came unto me, saying." The whole section divides itself into two parts—the first (vv. 9-11) gives the account of the symbolical transaction; and the second (vv. 13-15) records the verbal prophecy.

The symbolical act was occasioned by the following circumstance: There arrived in Jerusalem, probably on the very morning after the vision, three prominent men as a deputation from the Haggolah, "the Captivity"—that is, from those who were still settled in Babylon, to that place they were originally carried "captive"—bringing with them an offering of silver and gold for the Temple, which was then still in building. The sight of these men from "far-off" Babylon, bearing their offering for the Lord's House, was the occasion of the opening of the prophet's eyes by the Spirit of God to behold the future glorious Temple, which in Messiah's time shall be established in Jerusalem as an House of Prayer for all nations, and to which even the Gentile peoples which are "far off" shall flock, bringing their worship and their offerings.

The incident recorded in John 12:20-33 may in a sense be regarded as parallel to this. There the coming of Andrew and Philip to our Lord with the touching request made in the first instance to the latter of these two disciples by the Greeks who came up to Jerusalem among those who came up to worship at the feast: "Sir, we would see Jesus," took our Savior's mind to the time when "all men," without distinction of race or nationality, shall be "drawn" unto Him, and to the only possible way by which this could be brought about. In the temple of His pre-resurrection body, as the Son of David, there was no room for these poor Gentiles. The Son of Man must be lifted up: except the corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. So here the appearance in Jerusalem of these strangers takes the prophet's mind from the Temple they were then building, over the second outer court of which when completed there was the inscription put up in Greek and Latin: "No stranger may enter here on pain of death", to the future Temple, which Messiah, the true Prince and Priest, of whom Zerubbabel and Joshua the son of Josedech, were types (foreshadows), would build; which, as already said, shall be an House of Prayer for all nations, and in which those that are "far off"—by which we must understand not only the Jews who were still in the far lands of their "captivity," but the Gentiles, "from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same," as the last post-exilic prophet Malachi predicts—"shall come and build."

The Verbal Prophecy

Having placed this crown upon the head of Joshua, the prophet was, by the Lord's command, to deliver to him the following message: "Thus speaketh Jehovah of hosts, saying, Behold the Man whose name is the Branch, and He shall grow up out of His place, and He shall build the Temple of the Lord: even He shall build the temple of the Lord: and He shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a priest upon His throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between them both"

This is one of the most remarkable and precious Messianic prophecies, and there is no plainer prophetic utterance in the whole Old Testament as to the Person of the promised Redeemer, the offices He was to fill, and the mission He was to accomplish. Let us examine the sentence in detail.

"Behold the man!"—an expression which has become famous and of profound significance, since some five centuries later, in the overruling providence of God, it was used by Pilate on the day when He Who came to bring life into the world was Himself led forth to a death of shame.

Here, however, it is not to the Son of Man in His humiliation, to the "Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief," that our attention is directed by God Himself, but to the only true Man after God's own heart—the Man par excellence—the Ideal and Representative of the race, Who, after having for our salvation worn the crown of thorns, shall, as the reward of His sufferings, be "crowned with glory and honor," and have all things put in subjection under His feet.

"Behold the Man!" "Behold My Servant!" (Isa. 42:1, 52:13), "Behold thy King!" (Zech. 9:9), "Behold your God!" (Isa. 40:9): thus variously, as calling attention to the different aspects of the character of the same blessed Person, is this word "Behold" used by God Himself.

"Behold the Man!"—the words are indeed addressed to Joshua, but by no possibility can they be made to apply to him as the subject, as modern Jews and some rationalistic Christian interpreters seek to do.

Joshua himself knew of a certainty that that which was set forth by the symbolical act of his being crowned, and the great prophecy contained in the words which followed, could not refer to himself.

"And He shall build the temple of Jehovah; even He (or, literally, He Himself) shall build the temple of Jehovah."

The repetition and the strong emphasis laid upon the pronoun "He" being intended as an affirmation both of the certainty of the fact, and the greatness of the task to be accomplished by Him. Joshua the priest and Zerubbabel the prince were then engaged in the building of a temple, and one primary object in the visions and prophecies of Zechariah—even as it was of Haggai—was to encourage them in the task which was now nearing completion. But, perhaps as a reward for his faithfulness, or as an encouragement to those who sorrowed because of the apparent insignificance of the House they were then able to build (Ezra 3:10-13, Hag. 2:3, Zech. 4:10), the prophet is commissioned of God to reveal to Joshua that another, greater than he and his companion, but whom they in their respective offices had the honor to foreshadow—He who would combine in His own Person the dignities of priesthood and royalty—would build the temple of Jehovah, of which also that they were now engaged in building was a type and pledge.

But, we may ask, what temple is it which the Messiah, according to this and other predictions, was to build?

In answer to this question we would say first of all that we cannot exclude from this prophecy the reference to a literal temple in Jerusalem, which shall, after Israel's national conversion, be built under the superintendence of their Messiah-King, and which will, during the millennial period, be "the House of Jehovah" on earth, to which "the nations will flow" and many peoples go, in order that they may be taught His ways, and learn to walk in His paths, and which will be literally "An House of Prayer" and worship "for all nations." (Isa. 2:2-4. Isa. 56:6-7, Mic. 4:1-7, Ezek. 60-63)

But there is something greater and deeper in this prophecy than the reference to a future material temple on earth, however glorious that may be. The temple in Jerusalem was the outward visible symbol of communion between God and His people, which in the past has never been perfectly realized. And let us remember, mysterious and wonderful as it may appear to us, that not only is the blessedness of man created in the image of God conditional on communion with his Maker, but the infinite and ever-blessed God, the Father of spirits, seeks communion with man. Indeed, it might be said that this was the chief object which God had in creating man—that he might be a temple to contain His perfection and fulness; that the mind with which He had endowed him might comprehend and admire His infinite wisdom, and his heart respond to His love. In the Garden of Eden we get a beautiful glimpse of what was intended as the beginning of a fellowship between God and man, which was to go on and unfold through limitless ages.

But soon sin—that hateful and accursed thing in God's universe—entered, and communion between God and man was interrupted. The outward token of this was the banishment of the man from the garden, and the placing of the cherubim with the "flaming sword which turned every way" to bar the way against his re-entering that blessed abode.

But the heart of God yearned for man, and in His infinite wisdom and grace He devised a means by which His banished be not forever an outcast from Him.

He chose Israel, whom He suffered to approach to Him through the sprinkling of blood, which in His mind pointed to the blood of the everlasting covenant which the Messiah, who was to be "led as a lamb to the slaughter," was to shed as an atonement for sin; and to them His proclamation went forth, "Make Me a tabernacle, that I may dwell among you." The tabernacle was built, and then the temple on Mount Moriah; but soon, alas! this temple, too, was defiled, and sin in its progress made such rapid strides that it penetrated even into the Holy of Holies, and God was obliged entirely to withdraw His manifest presence even from His chosen dwelling-place.

After the destruction of the first temple by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 25) the Jews built another one after their restoration from Babylon; but the manifest presence of Jehovah no more returned to it; for Rabbi Samuel Bar Juni, in the Talmud (Yoma, f. 21, c. 2), and Rabbis Solomon and Kimchi, in their comment on Hag. 1:8, all agree that five things that were in the first Temple were wanting in the second—i.e., the ark, wherein were the tables of the Covenant, and the cherubim that covered it; the fire that used to come down from heaven to devour the sacrifices; the Shekinah Glory; the gift of prophecy, or the Holy Ghost; and the miraculous Urim and Thummim.

But before that temple was destroyed by the Romans, another temple, not built by the hands of man, arose, and in it dwelt the fulness of the Godhead bodily (Col. 2:9). One came, and in sight of the magnificent structure which had then become more a "den of thieves" than a "house of prayer," proclaimed, "Destroy this Temple, and in three days I will raise it up again; and this He spake of the Temple of His body." Who was this who thus spoke but the promised Messiah, with whose advent the presence of Jehovah should again return to His people, as is implied in His very name Immanuel, which being interpreted means "God with us." Behold, "the tabernacle of God is with men" once more, "and He doth dwell with them." For "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John 1:14).

Behold, therefore, O Christian, in the Person of the Redeemer Himself, the fulfilment of these words, "He shall build the Temple of Jehovah," for in Him we have the fullest manifestation of the divine glory, and "in Christ Jesus" is the true meeting-place where communion between God and man is consummated.

But there is another temple of which the Messiah Himself is actually the builder, and in which we may see a fulfilment of this and other prophecies.

"Thou art Peter," were the words of Jesus on a certain solemn occasion, "and upon this rock (i.e., the confession Peter had just uttered, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God") I will build My Church, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it." And what is the Church but the Temple of the living God, of which the tabernacle and material Temple in Jerusalem were but types (foreshadows), and in which His fulness, and glory shall be eternally manifested? Thus the Apostle Peter, addressing primarily Jewish believers, says: "Ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual House"; and in a yet fuller manner, Paul, addressing Gentile believers, writes: "Ye are no more strangers and sojourners, but ye are fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God, being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus Himself being the Chief Corner-stone; in whom each several building, fitly framed together, groweth into a holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God in the Spirit" (Eph. 2:19-22, R.V.). And how glorious is this Temple which "the Man Whose Name is the Branch" is now, by His Spirit through His servants, building! It is He Who, as the Eternal Word, built the material temple of the Universe, which is filling the minds of men in successive generations more and more with wonder and astonishment. What a spectacle, for instance, do the starry heavens present to us! The more we contemplate them, the more we are lost in wonder at their immeasurable immensity, and the more do our hearts go up in reverent adoration of the God Whose eternity, glory, power, and wisdom they ceaselessly proclaim in language intelligible to every human heart. But the spiritual temple which He is now engaged in building, when completed, will astonish even the admiring angels, and will throughout eternity show forth to principalities and powers in heavenly places "the manifold wisdom" as well as the infinite grace of God (Eph. 3:10).

But to proceed to the next sentence:

"And He shall bear the glory, or regal majesty"

The pronoun is again emphatic: He Himself, and none other, shall build the temple of Jehovah, and He Himself shall bear the glory, or regal majesty, as none other has borne it. He is peerless in His work and in His reward. His is the glory of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

Already, as the result of His sufferings, having by the grace of God tasted death for every man, He is "exalted and extolled, and lifted very high," "crowned with honor and glory"; but this prophecy speaks especially of the royal majesty which He shall bear when He shall come forth again from the presence of the Father—and, all His enemies having been made a footstool for His feet, He shall sit down upon His own throne as the theocratic King of Israel.

Then, indeed, upon His head there shall be "many crowns"; for, not only will God the Father invest Him with glory and majesty, but men too, especially His own nation, will glorify Him; "and He," as the true Son of David, the One Whose right it is to reign, "shall be for a throne of glory to His Father's house: and they shall hang upon Him all the glory of His Father's house, the offspring and the issue, every small vessel, from the vessels of cups to the vessels of flagons (large vessels)" (Isa. 22:23, 24). We come to the next sentence of the prophecy:

"And He shall sit and rule upon His throne"

i.e., He shall not only possess the honor and dignity of a king; He shall not be "a constitutional" monarch, who reigns but does not rule; but He shall Himself exercise all royal power and authority. Yes, the rule of King-Messiah will be absolute and autocratic, but autocracy will be safe and beneficent in the hands of the Holy One, Who is infinite in wisdom, power, and love. The result of His blessed rule will be that—

"In His days shall the righteous flourish;
And abundance of peace till the moon be no more.
He shall have dominion also from sea to sea,
And from the River unto the ends of the earth.
Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him;
All nations shall serve Him.
He shall judge the poor of the people,
He shall save the children of the needy,
And shall break in pieces the oppressor;
For He shall deliver the needy when he crieth,
And the poor that hath no helper.
He shall redeem their soul from oppression and violence:
And precious shall their blood be in His sight. . . .
And men shall be blessed in Him:
All nations shall call Him blessed."

(Ps. 72)

The character of His blessed rule is further explained in the next sentence:

"And He shall be a priest upon His throne."

How full of significance is this one sentence of Holy Writ! As is the manner of Zechariah, we have in these four Hebrew words a terse summary of nearly all that the former prophets have spoken of Messiah and His work.

Here is the true Melchizedek, Who is at the same time King of Righteousness, King of Salem, which is King of Peace, and the great High Priest, whose priesthood, unlike the Aaronic, abideth "forever." "He shall be a Priest upon His throne."

Now He royally exercises His high priestly office as the Advocate with the Father, and only Mediator between God and man, at the right hand of God in heaven. From thence He shall come forth again to take possession of His throne, and to commence His long-promised reign on the earth. But, even when as King he exercises His sovereign rule, He will still be "a Priest upon His throne," who will have compassion upon the ignorant and erring (Heb. 5: 2), and cause His righteous severity to go forth only against the wilfully forward (contrary) and rebellious. For our Lord Jesus is "the same yesterday, today, and forever"; and that which will eternally constitute His chief glory will be, not His power, but His grace, manifested once in His laying down His life—a ransom for many—and since in His priestly mediatorial rule, whether in heaven or on earth.

"And the counsel of peace shall be between them both."

The expression atsath shalom, "counsel of peace," means not merely "peace," for if that alone were meant, the simple idiom vehayah shalom, "there shall be peace between them both," would be used. The word used here signifies a counsel planning or procuring peace for some other than those who counsel.

In all fulness the blessed fruit of this "counsel of peace," and the "thoughts of salvation" between the Father and the Son, will only be realized by Israel and the nations of the earth during the period of Messiah's reign, and by the one Church of the living God through the eternity that is to follow. Then—in the limitless ages to come—"He will show the exceeding riches of His grace in kindness toward us in Christ Jesus, according to His good pleasure which He purposed in Him unto a dispensation of the fulness of the times, to sum up all things in Christ, the things in the heavens, and the things upon the earth . . . according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His will" (Eph. 1:9-11, 2:7, R.V.).

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

The visions are ended. What follows the banishment of evil from the land and the overthrow of world power from the earth?

After the fall what was God's primary motive in redeeming man? How does the temple of God fit into the scheme of redemption?

Zechariah 7:1-14

Nearly two years had elapsed since that memorable night on which the series of eight visions were shown to the prophet—in which are unfolded, as in a wonderful panorama, the thoughts and purposes of God concerning Israel and the nations from the beginning to the very end of this age—when the word of Jehovah came again to Zechariah. The day, the month, and the year of this divine oracle are clearly given—it was "in the fourth day of the ninth month, even in Chislev" (answering to December), "in the fourth year of King Darius."

The occasion when the prophet was inspired to utter this great and comforting prophecy, which stands separate and complete in itself, though going over in plain, verbal prophecy the same line of thought as unfolded by the visions, is clearly stated in the first three verses of ch. 7.

To understand the circumstances which brought about the very significant incident recorded in these verses, we have to remember that the fourth year of Darius was a time when things seemed to go well, and looked promising to the remnant who had returned to the land. Every hindrance to the completion of the building of the temple had been removed by the royal decree of Darius, as recorded in Ezra 6. Even the city of Jerusalem, in spite of the desolations which still prevailed in some of its quarters, and the ruinous condition of its walls, was beginning to improve and revive, and contained already some fine private residences, as we may judge from Hag. 1:4.

The question, therefore, naturally agitated the minds of the people whether, with these signs of apparent prosperity the restored remnant should continue to observe the days of national sorrow and fasting which had been instituted in commemoration of the destruction of the temple, and the desolation of the land at the commencement of the seventy years' captivity.

The initiative in bringing this point to an issue was taken by the inhabitants of Bethel, who sent a deputation of two of their prominent citizens, "with his men" (i.e., attendants or retainers of Regem-melech—he being probably a man of importance), "to entreat the favor of Jehovah, and to speak unto the priests of the house of Jehovah of hosts, and to the prophets, saying, Should I (or, 'Shall I continue to') weep in the fifth month, separating myself as I have done these so many years?"

As the consolatory messages in the visions are introduced by a call to repentance, and the reminder that all their sorrows and troubles were occasioned by their disobedience to the words which Jehovah had spoken to them through the former prophets (ch. 1:1-6), so also the wonderful prophecy of the future blessing of Israel and the future glory of Jerusalem in ch. 8 is preceded by what is practically also a call to repentance in ch. 7:4-14, and the exhortation to give heed at last to the words of the same "former prophets."

But let us now examine in detail the different parts of the answer.

The first "word of Jehovah" which the prophet was commissioned to speak not only to the deputation from Bethel, but to "all the people of the land" whose thought the men of Bethel expressed, "and to the priests" who, instead of answering to the ideal "messengers of Jehovah of hosts" (Mal. 3:5), and being able to give answer in such an emergency, had, in Haggai's and Zechariah's time, sunk to the same level as the people—was designed to show the worthlessness before God of mere outward acts, or forms of repentance and piety, if the inner spirit of them be wanting.

"When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth month and in the seventh, even these seventy years, did ye at all fast unto Me, even Me?" (Zech. 7:5)

In these words the Lord overthrows the false notion which they may have entertained, which certainly the Jews now do entertain, that fasting in itself is a meritorious act. He admits that they had fasted long, "seventy years," and often, not only in the fifth but also "in the seventh month," which was the fast appointed for the murder of Gedaliah, which completed the calamities of Jerusalem, and led to the migration of the little remnant to Egypt for fear of the vengeance of the Chaldeans.

Moreover, they were very thorough and earnest about their fasts; they not only abstained from food (as in Jewish fasts still, which are one unbroken abstinence from food and drink from sunset to sunset), but they accompanied their fasting with mourning and lamentations—the word used in the 5th verse being used for mourning for the dead or for special great public calamities—and yet their observance of these fasts was a matter of utter indifference to God. Why? Because even in their fasting and mourning they were centered on themselves; they fasted not unto God. It was not the outward sign and accompaniment of true sorrow and repentance for sin, but of sorrow for their calamities. They were self-imposed, to begin with; and they regarded them, not only as intrinsically meritorious, but as an end in themselves rather than the means of turning away from self and all idea of self-merit to the grace of God. And not only in their fasts but also in their feasts there was the same concentration on self and regardlessness of God. "And when ye eat and when ye drink, do not ye eat for yourselves and drink for yourselves?" which is the very opposite of the apostolic exhortation, which really sums up the intention and spirit of the many precepts and commandments of the law—"Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God"

But apart from the special message which they conveyed to those to whom they were originally addressed, and their application to the Jewish people at the time, there is a solemn lesson in these words which men at the present time, both Jews and Christians, should lay to heart. Are there not thousands now who are very zealous and regular in religious observances, and who think that they are acquiring great merit before God, to whom Christ in that day will say, "Depart from Me; I never knew you?" Did ye at all do it unto Me, even Me? Was it not for the most part will-worship and mere religiousness, without any knowledge of, or real regard for, the will of God?

"And the word of the Lord came unto Zechariah, saying, Thus hath the Lord of hosts spoken, saying, Execute true judgment, and show mercy and compassion every man to his brother: and oppress not the widow, nor the fatherless, the stranger, nor the poor; and let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart"

Here we are reminded of Isa. 58:6-12, and many other scriptures in the earlier prophets, where the Lord tells us the kind of fast in which He does take pleasure—"Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bonds of wickedness, to undo the bands of the yoke, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh? (Isa. 58:6-8, R.V.).

But Zechariah, in the passage we are now considering (vv. 8-10), instead of quoting the exact words of the former prophets, gives the substance of their preaching on this subject in words renewed to himself by the direct inspiration of the Spirit of God.

We note also that it is particularly man's duties to his neighbors which are here summarized; but man's duty to God is presupposed, for even the precepts which inculcate love and mercy to our fellow-men, are enforced by the words, "I am Jehovah thy God," which remind us of our relation and obligations to Him, even as in the New Testament it is our debt of love and gratitude to Christ which is the impelling motive of love to the brotherhood. And let me remind you, dear reader, that Christians do have need to lay these moral precepts to heart, for though we are not under the law, the law of God is written on our hearts, and it is His purpose that the righteousness of the law should be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. Beside, whatever be our relation to the law of Moses, we are "under law to Christ," and it is in the New Testament that we are commanded to live and act justly and righteously, and to "have compassion one upon the other," and "to think no evil," which is the equivalent of the beautiful word we have in this passage in Zechariah, "Let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart."

But to return to our context. This was the summary of the teaching of the former prophets; the result is stated in vv. 11 and 12: "But they refused to hearken, and pulled away the shoulder, and stopped their ears that they should not hear. Yea, they made their hearts as an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the Lord of hosts had sent by His Spirit by the hand of the former prophets: therefore came there great wrath from the Lord of hosts."

The parallel to ch. 7:8-14 is ch. 1:4-6. There also we read, "Be not as your fathers, to whom the former prophets cried, saying, Thus saith Jehovah of hosts, Return ye now from your evil ways and your evil doings; but they did not hear nor hearken unto Me, saith Jehovah." Here, however, the process of Israel's self-hardening and disobedience, which brought about the desolation of the land and the scattering of the people, is enlarged upon, (a) "They refused to hearken" or to give heed to the word of God through the prophets. (b) "They pulled away the shoulder," vayyitt' nu khatheph sorareth, a Hebrew phrase which is found elsewhere only in that great confession in Neh. 9:29, and means literally they offered a recusant, or unwilling, rebellious shoulder instead of serving Jehovah "with joyfulness and gladness of heart" (Deut. 28:47), and finding His yoke easy and His burden light, (c) "And stopped their ears" (hikhbidu), literally, "made it heavy" the word being the same as in that solemn passage, Isa. 6:10, "Make the heart of the people fat, and make their ears heavy and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and turn again, and be healed."

It is one of the terrible moral consequences of men turning away from doing the will of God, that the more they hear, the duller their perceptions become, so that in the end, though having eyes, they see not. (d) The final stage of this process of rebellious self-hardening is expressed in the first line of the 12th verse: "And they made their hearts as an adamant stone." It is not quite certain what stone is meant by (shamir), but it was harder than flint (Ezek. 3:9). In Jer. 17:1 it is rendered "diamond." "It was hard enough to cut ineffaceable characters; it would cut rocks, but could not be graven itself or receive the characters of God."

Truly a fit figure to set forth the hardness and obduracy (hardened in feelings) of the natural unregenerate heart. It is altogether hopeless, and nothing can be done to improve or soften it; the only hope for men in such condition being in this stony heart being altogether taken away by the power and grace of God, and in the creation within them of "an heart of flesh," responsive and impressionable to the Spirit and Word of God.

The enormity of the guilt of Israel is magnified by the fact that that which they refused to hear and to receive into their hearts in order to obey was the (torah) "law," which we must take in the usual sense as describing the law of Moses, and the (debharim) "words" of "the former prophets," neither of which originated with man, both being "sent by Jehovah of hosts through the Spirit"; which is a very remarkable incidental statement of the Bible's own claim to inspiration.

The human channel of communication used of God may be Moses, or Isaiah, or Jeremiah, or any of the other "prophets," but the wonderful things they spoke came not by the will of man, but these holy men of God "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. 1:20, 21).

And the process of apostasy here described by Zechariah did not end with the rejection of the law and the words which God spoke through the prophets. It continued even after the partial restoration, as far as the great majority of the people was concerned. The climax was reached when, after the continued process of disobedience and self-hardening, and because their hearts were already alienated from God, Israel turned their backs upon Him Who was not only the greatest of the prophets, but was Himself "the Word of God"—"the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person."

Nor, alas! can Christendom boast or glory over the Jews, for its history too, is one of continued rebellion, not only against the law and the prophets, but against the greater light of New Testament revelation, and culminates in the greatest apostasy in the history of the human race, when Satan shall be worshipped instead of God, and Antichrist preferred to Christ.

The consequence of this continued provocation of God and the hardening of their hearts against His word was that "there came great wrath from Jehovah of hosts," for God is not mocked, and, however great and wonderful His patience and long-suffering, His anger is in the end poured out upon all who are obdurately impenitent.

On the last page of the Hebrew Bible—which, as the books are there arranged, closes with 2 Chronicles—we read these very sad and pathetic words: "Moreover all the chiefs of the priests, and the people, trespassed very greatly after all the abominations of the heathen; and they polluted the house of the Lord which He had hallowed in Jerusalem. And the Lord, the God of their fathers, sent to them by His messengers, rising up early and sending; because He had compassion on His people and on His dwelling-place: but they mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and scoffed at His prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, till there was no remedy" (2 Chron. 36:14-16)—"till there was no remedy" and "there came great wrath from Jehovah"

How His wrath showed itself is next described: "And it came to pass as He cried (that is, 'called, remonstrated, and reasoned with them through the prophets') and they would not hear, so they shall cry" (in their distress and anguish) "and I will not hear"—solemn and awful words, which have not only verified themselves in the terrible history of the Jewish people these past two thousand years, but are a warning to the individual sinner, whether Jew or Gentile, of whom similar language is used (Prov. 1:24-33), when he hears God's voice, not to harden his heart and refuse to obey His word as Israel did, "in the provocation and the day of temptation in the wilderness," and who entered not into God's rest because of unbelief.

The last verse of the 7th chapter shows the awful consequences of the "great wrath" which came from Jehovah:

(a) In relation to the people. "But I will scatter them" (ve'esa-areim—"as with a whirlwind" or, "I will toss them") "among all the nations whom they have not known"; who will therefore have no pity or compassion upon them—a process which only began with the destruction of the first temple and the seventy years' captivity in Babylon, but has continued all through the centuries since, during which the Jewish nation continues to be "sifted," or "tossed about among all nations as corn is tossed about in a sieve" (Amos 9)—until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled, and "He that scattered Israel shall gather him and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock."

(b) In relation to the land. "And the land was desolate (or most probably, 'shall be desolate,' the perfect tense standing here for the future, or 'prophetic perfect') after them so that there shall be no one passing through or returning" (meobher umishabh)—an idiom expressing the fact that the land shall be destitute of a population, so that there shall be none to pass to and fro, or "up and down" in it; a prophecy also which has not only verified itself during the seventy years' captivity, but in the course of the many centuries since the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans, during which the land has in the providence of God been practically without a people, while the people has been without a land.

Hitherto in vv. 13 and 14 God in the first person has been the speaker, but the last sentence with which the chapter closes seems to be a reflection of the prophet's, in which he gives God the glory by ascribing the desolation which has come upon the land as due entirely to their sins: "And they made the pleasant land" (eretz hemdah, a beautiful and true description of the promised land which is carried over from Jer. 3:19) "a desolation"; for, just as all nature was involved in Adam's sin, and ever since the Fall "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now" (Rom. 8); so Palestine, which is indeed naturally "a delightful" and fertile land, has in a special manner become involved in the sin of Israel, and lies desolate until the people's covenant relationship to God is restored, when the land shall once again, and more than ever before, flow with milk and honey, and "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."

Now, in conclusion, to sum up the negative part of the answer to the question put by the deputation from Bethel. Its purport (content, purpose) was as follows: There is no occasion as yet to abrogate the observances of the fasts in which you call to mind the calamities which you and your fathers have brought upon the land, by your evil ways and doings, for the underlying cause of the evil which came upon you—namely, sin and rebellion against the word which God spake to you through the former prophets—you have not yet truly repented of. Your fasting and mourning, however, are in themselves nothing to God so long as they are not the accompaniment of a real sorrow for sin, and a heart-desire to do His will as expressed in His moral law. Take warning, therefore, from the experience of your fathers—who kept on hardening their hearts, until there was no more remedy, and great wrath from God came upon them—lest the same, and something worse yet, happen to you.

The positive part of the answer, which tells when and how the fasts shall be abrogated, yea, turned into feasts, follows in ch. 8.

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What does the Lord say is better than animal sacrifices and fasting? Why?

Ps. 116:16-17 Prov. 21:3 Heb. 13:10-16

Is it God's work or man's to achieve the following: repentance, hear with ears unstopped and having a soft heart?

Zechariah 8:1-23

As shown in the exposition of the 7th chapter, of which the scripture we are now to consider is a continuation, the message which the prophet was inspired to deliver, not only to the deputation from Bethel, but "to all the people of the land," in answer to the question whether they should continue to observe the fasts which had been appointed in celebration of certain sad anniversaries connected with the destruction of the temple and the desolations of the land by the Chaldeans, divides itself into two parts.

The first, which I have described as the negative part of the answer, is contained in ch. 7; and the second, or positive part, in ch. 8. "Each of these two larger divisions," to repeat some sentences from the previous exposition, "is, however, again subdivided into two sections—the whole answer thus falling into four parts, each of which begins with the words, 'And the word of Jehovah of hosts came to me, saying' (7:4, 8, 8:1,18)—the usual formula, as has already been pointed out, by which the prophets authenticated their messages as being not of, or from, themselves, but from the mouth of the Lord."

The negative part of the answer in the 7th chapter may, moreover, be regarded in a very important sense as preparatory to the debharim tobbim debharim nichummim ("good words, even comforting words," 1:13), which the prophet proceeds to unfold in the glorious prophecy in ch. 8 inasmuch as ch. 7 is practically a call to repentance, and a solemn reminder that their sorrows were the direct consequence of their sins, and that before Israel's fasts shall at last turn to feasts, and they shall enjoy the "good thing" which Jehovah has promised them, they must give heed to the voice of the prophets, and be no more like their fathers, who brought all these calamities upon themselves by obdurate disobedience and progressive apostasy from God.

The first section of the consolatory message in ch. 8 consists of vv. 1 to 17.

The first thing which strikes us in reading the series of great and precious promises in this scripture is the frequent reiteration of the sentence—"saith Jehovah of hosts." Apart from the authenticating formula, "The word of Jehovah of hosts came unto me," by which each of the four sections is introduced, it is repeated eleven times in the first seventeen verses of the 8th chapter; and the object and reason for it is to strengthen our faith, and to assure us at the very outset that, however incredible from a natural or human point of view the fulfilment of these things may be, they will most certainly come to pass, because the Name of the infinite, eternal, and faithful Jehovah, with Whom nothing is too hard or impossible, stands pledged to their accomplishment.

Let us bear this in mind as we proceed, and not stagger at the promises of God through unbelief, saying, as many, alas, do say, "How is it possible?" The series of promises commences with the words, "Thus saith Jehovah of hosts, I am, jealous for Zion with great jealousy, and I am jealous for her with great wrath (or 'fury')."

This is a repetition, with one slight variation in the original, but "in the same rhythm," of the declaration of His tender love for Zion in the first of the series of visions (ch. 1:14). And because His love for Zion is so great, He is jealous on her account, and His anger is stirred to the heat of "fury" against the nations, for the reason already stated in the first vision, namely, because when He was but "a little displeased" and gave over "the dearly beloved of His soul" for a time into the hands of her enemies (Jer. 12:7), the nations among whom they were scattered "showed them no mercy," but rather "helped forward the affliction."

We have dwelt fully on these solemn and fervent words of Jehovah and their application, not only to the great world-powers of antiquity, but to the nations of Christendom, in my exposition of the first vision, so we need not tarry on this point here. But I may take the opportunity of again emphasizing one fact in connection with the warning to the nations contained in these words, and this is the testimony which history supplies, that God's jealous anger and hot displeasure against the nations, because of their oppression and cruelty to Israel, is to be greatly dreaded. "Where," to repeat a few sentences, "are the great nations of antiquity who have lifted up their hands against the Jewish people?"

And in modern times the ancient word which God spake to Abraham is still verifying itself in the experience of nations as of individuals: "I will bless them that bless thee, and him that curseth thee will I curse."

And the fervent inalienable love of Jehovah for His people will manifest itself, not only in His wrath and indignation against the nations who have oppressed and persecuted them, but in the full restoration of the long-interrupted communion.

"Thus saith Jehovah, I am returned to Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem"—the glad announcement of which, contained in the two verbs shabhti and shakhanti ("I am returned" and "I will dwell," which are in the prophetic perfect tense), being again an inspired repetition of the "good and comfortable words" which were set forth in the first vision.

Thus the word shabhti ("I am returned") takes us back to ch. 1:16 ("I am returned—shabhti—to Jerusalem with mercies"), and shakhanti ("I will dwell") to ch. 2:10, where we read, "Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith Jehovah."

According to some commentators these glad announcements of the return and dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of His people, in ch. 8, "signify nothing more nor less than the restitution of His favor and goodwill toward Israel" (C. H. H. Wright), as shown in their partial restoration from Babylon, and in the relief which the remnant then experienced. But this is a very poor and inadequate view to take of this prophecy, as its very connection with the glorious predictions in chs. 1 and 2 itself shows. No, as I have shown in my notes on the first vision, the announcement, "I am returned to Zion with mercies," is itself the very heart and substance of the consoling part of the message which the prophet was commissioned to deliver; and the fulfilment of the promise, "I will dwell in the midst of thee," is the goal to which all the former prophets looked forward, and will in its fulness be realized only in the visible and manifest reign—in and from Mount Zion, in the midst of restored and converted Israel, of Him Whose Name is "Immanuel"—which, being interpreted, is "God with us."

We take this promise, then, not only in a more literal, but, if we may use the expression, also in a more personal sense. At the commencement of "the times of the Gentiles," which began with the Babylonian Captivity, when God was about to give Israel over into the hands of their enemies, the prophet Ezekiel saw the slow and reluctant departure of the glory of Jehovah from the Temple and City of Jerusalem. And with this withdrawal of the presence of Jehovah from the midst of His people, commenced Israel's Ichabod period, and the long night of darkness which has rested on the people and on the land. But not forever has Jehovah forsaken His land and cast off His people. "I will go," He said through the prophet Hosea, "and return to My place till they acknowledge their offence" (or, lit., "till they declare themselves guilty"), "and seek My face: in their affliction (lit., 'in their tribulation') they shall seek Me early." Then He will return unto them with mercies, and "His going forth is sure as the morning; and He shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter rain that watereth the earth" (Hos. 5:15, 6:1-3).

In its fulness, to repeat again some sentences from the notes on the first vision, this promise will only be fulfilled when this same Jesus, Whom at His first coming they handed over to the Gentiles to be crucified, and Who, after His resurrection, ascended back into heaven to the glory which He had with the Father before the world was, shall return in the manner, and under the circumstances, described by the same prophet in the last three chapters of his prophecy.

Then Jehovah, in the person of the Messiah, "will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem" which shall become the center of His governmental dealings with the world, and the place whence light and truth shall go forth unto all the nations. "And Jerusalem shall be called 'Ir ha-emeth, the City of Truth'"; first, because it shall be the seat of the El-emeth, "The God of Truth"; and, secondly, because "the remnant of Israel," which shall then dwell in it, "shall not any longer do iniquity, nor speak lies" (Zeph. 3:13), but be known throughout the earth for their truth and fidelity toward God and man. "And the mountain of Jehovah of hosts" i.e., Mount Zion, shall be called "The Holy Mountain" because there the Holy One of Israel shall once more take up His abode, and by His presence in their midst sanctify His people, so that they, too, shall be holy; and, Qodesh la-Ychovah—"Holiness (or 'holy') unto Jehovah," shall be written, not only upon their hearts and foreheads, but upon all their possessions, down to the very "bells of their horses," and the "pots" which they shall use to prepare their food.

Now follows a beautiful picture of restored and flourishing Jerusalem. No longer shall the holy city, and the land of which it is the metropolis, be depopulated by wars and other grievous calamities, and lie desolate; no longer shall such terrible sights be witnessed in her streets as are described by inspired writers who witnessed the siege and capture of the city by the Babylonians, which, however, were surpassed in the still more awful and horrible conditions which prevailed during the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and in subsequent sieges since then—when old and young were cut off without mercy, and those children and sucklings who were not destroyed by the sword "fainted for hunger in the top of every street." But the promises contained already in the law, of prolongation of life and numerous offspring, which in the past have been only at certain intervals partially fulfilled, because of Israel's sin and disobedience, shall, under the new and unconditional covenant, into which the people shall then be brought, be fully realized. There and then "there shall be no more an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days." Then "they shall not build and another inhabit; they shall not plant and another eat; for as the days of a tree shall be the days of My people, and My chosen shall long enjoy the work of their hands" (Isa. 65:20-22). And thus it shall come to pass, saith Jehovah of hosts, that "there shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, every man with his staff in his hand, for multitude of days. And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." "The two opposite pictures," to adopt words of another writer, "the old man so aged that he has to lean on his staff for support because of the multitude of his days," and the young in the glad buoyancy of recent life, fresh from their Creator's hands (shall in that day) "attest alike" (as in measure they do now in all communities of men) "the goodness of the Creator Who protecteth both, the children in their yet undeveloped strength, and the very old, whom He hath brought through all the changes and chances of this mortal life, in their yet sustained weakness; for the tottering limbs of the very old, and the elastic, perpetual motion (and playfulness) of childhood, are like far distant chords of the diapason (burst of harmonious sound) of the Creator's love." (Pusey)

Then, as if doubly to confirm the immutability of His counsel, and to strengthen our hearts in the certain fulfilment of the things just announced, as well as of those which follow—however "marvellous" or "impossible" they may appear to human sight—there follows a brief parenthetical statement (v. 6) which is closed in, so to say, by a twofold use of the divine attesting formula, "saith Jehovah of hosts."

Even the saved remnant, contemplating the actual fulfilment of these great and precious promises, will exclaim, "This is Jehovah's doing" (or, lit., "This is of Jehovah"; for by no human or natural means could this have been brought about)—"it is marvellous in our eyes" (Ps. 118:23). But "thus saith Jehovah of hosts, If it is marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in those days—should it also be marvellous in Mine eyes? saith Jehovah of hosts"

The word yipalei, used in this verse, from polla, rendered variously "wonderful," "marvellous," "hard," "difficult," "hidden," in the Authorised Version, reminds us of its use in at least two other places in the Old Testament in which God wants to teach us the great and prominent lesson which He has designed the whole of mankind to learn from the history of Israel. One is in Gen. 18. There we read that "Sarah laughed within herself" when she heard the Angel of Jehovah give the definite promise to Abraham of the birth of Isaac, for to nature and human reasoning it was no longer possible for Sarah to bear a child. But "Jehovah said to Abraham, Wherefore did Sarah laugh, saying, Shall I of a surety bear a child, which am old? Is anything too hard (or 'wonderful') for Jehovah?"

Indeed, one great reason of the long delay of the fulfilment of the promise of the birth of the child, in whom the great promise of blessing for all nations was to be handed down, was because God wanted to lay a supernatural basis for the history of Israel; and that both Israel and the nations of the future might learn that the things which are naturally impossible are not supernaturally impossible, and that nothing which Jehovah has ever spoken is "too hard" for Him to accomplish.

The other place where the word is used is in Jer. 32, a prophecy which is in some respects parallel to Zech. 7 and 8. Jeremiah was shut up in the court of the prison adjoining the palace, when the word of the Lord came to him that his uncle's son, Hanameel, would come to him with the request that he should buy a piece of ground which belonged to him in Anathoth; and the prophet, in obedience to God's command, went through all the legal formalities connected with the purchase of land in Palestine. Now, from the human and natural point of view, the whole transaction seemed a mere farce and absurdity. The Chaldeans had already laid waste the whole land, and were even then besieging Jerusalem. How unlikely, so far as human probabilities went, that houses, or fields, or vineyards, would ever again be possessed by Jews in Palestine. Jeremiah's own faith in the promises of God in reference to the future of the people and the land, was strongly put to the test by this symbolical transaction which he was commanded to carry through, but he stood the test; he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief. He looked away from human improbabilities and natural impossibilities to the Almighty and covenant-keeping God, and exclaims (v. 17), "Ah, Lord God, behold Thou hast made the heaven and the earth by Thy great power and stretched-out arm, and there is nothing too hard (or 'wonderful') for Thee"—to which God Himself adds, so to say, His "Amen," by repeating in v. 23 the prophet's own words—"Behold, I am Jehovah, the God of all flesh; is there anything too hard (or 'marvellous') for Me?" and proceeds to tell him that, though the city and land would now be given over to desolation, and the people carried into captivity because of their great sin and manifold provocations of the Holy One, yet the time would assuredly come when "men shall buy fields for money, and subscribe the deeds and seal them, and call witnesses in every part of the promised land; for I will cause their captivity to return, saith Jehovah"

Before passing on to the following verses, let me ask you, dear reader, Have you learned this great lesson? Have you experienced personally the supernatural power of the living God, the Creator of the ends of the earth, Who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, and with Whom nothing is impossible, or "marvellous," in your own heart and life? For only then can you believe in the great and marvellous things which God promised to do for Israel in the future, and through them for the whole world.

But let us proceed to the next brief paragraph (vv. 7, 8). "Thus saith Jehovah of hosts, Behold I will save My people from the east country, and from the west country: and I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem; and they shall be My people, and I will be their God, in truth and righteousness"

This is one of the greatest and most comprehensive promises in reference to Israel's restoration and conversion to be found in the prophetic Scriptures, but on which I may not tarry long for want of space, and because I have fully dwelt on this subject in some of my other writings.

But let me very briefly point out in passing—first, that it is a promise which has manifestly not yet been fulfilled the expression "from the land of the rising of the sun, and from the land of the going down of the sun" properly rendered, "from the east country, and from the west country," in the English versions, really includes all parts of the earth, as may be seen from Ps. 50:1, 113:3; Mal. 1:11, etc., where the same Hebrew idiom is used. Now, never in the past has such a restoration taken place. A representative section, but a mere handful out of the whole people, was indeed brought back to the land after the seventy years' captivity in Babylon, of which Zechariah himself was a witness, but that could not possibly be the restoration here promised; first, because, as is to be inferred from the whole prophecy, this was to be something which should take place at a time future in the point of view, or outlook, of this post-exilic prophet, to whom, what we may call the chief act in the restoration from Babylon was already an accomplished fact; and, secondly, because that partial restoration was only from one direction, namely, from the east, or "north" (as Babylon and Persia were called, because their invasions of Palestine were from the north). From the "west" they could not then have been brought back, since very few of the Jewish nation had as yet wandered westward.

It was only at the second stage of Israel's dispersion, which was brought about by the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple by the Romans, that Israel became in the fullest sense a Diaspora—scattered over all the face of the earth—the majority always found in lands more or less to the west of Palestine. No; the promise here is a divine summary and repetition of the many promises of the yet future restoration which were uttered by the former prophets, as, for instance, Isa. 43:5, 6, where we read, "Fear not: for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth"; and will be fulfilled when "Jehovah shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people; . . . and He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth" (Isa. 11:11, 12).

That the restoration spoken of here is yet future, is proved also by the fact that it is to be followed by Israel's national conversion, which has certainly never yet taken place. "And they shall be My people, and I will be their God, in truth and in righteousness"

The restoration of Israel to their own land after the many centuries of dispersion and wanderings, will, as I have stated elsewhere, "be a great mercy and a wonderful event in the world's history"; but a still greater mercy, and a still more wonderful thing, will be the restoration of the long-interrupted covenant relationship and communion between them and their God. This is what is promised in the last words of the 8th verse: "They shall be My people"—the "Lo-ammi" period, during which Israel, separated from God, is given over into the hands of his enemies, shall at last be ended, and God shall again receive them graciously and acknowledge them as "Ammi" and He, Jehovah, shall be their God, be'emeth u-bhith's'dakah, "in truth and in righteousness"—even as we read in Hos. 2:19, 20: "And I will betroth thee unto Me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto Me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies. I will even betroth thee unto Me in faithfulness; and thou shalt know the Lord". But the expression be'emeth u-bhith's'dakah—"in truth and in righteousness"—belongs to both clauses of the brief statement which announces the restoration of the covenant relationship between Israel and God, for not only will God act toward them (as, indeed, on His part He has ever done) in truth and in righteousness, but this also shall henceforth be the condition of the people. No longer shall it be said of them that "they swear by the name of Jehovah, and make mention of the God of Israel, but not in truth nor in righteousness" (Isa. 48:1), but like the man after God's own heart, of whom the expression is first used (1 Kings 3:6), and their other fathers, who "walked with God"; so also restored and converted Israel shall walk before Him "in truth and in righteousness, and in uprightness of heart" throughout the rest of their national history—even as we read in Jer. 32:38-41, which, as already stated, is in some respects parallel to Zech. 8: "And they shall be My people, and I will be their God; and I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear Me forever, for the good of them, and of their children after them: and I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them, good; and I will put My fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from Me. Yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with My whole heart and with My whole soul."

The great and glorious promises contained in the first eight verses of this chapter, like all prophecy about the future, are to be turned to practical account. Not only is the restored remnant to derive comfort and stimulus from "these words," but they are to act as incentives in the path of obedience and to the more perfect accomplishment of the will of God in the present: "Thus saith Jehovah of hosts: Let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words from the mouth of the prophets which were in the day that the foundation of the house of Jehovah of hosts was laid, even the temple, that it might be built"

"Let your hands be strong," which is an idiom for the expression "Be of good courage" (Judg. 7:11; 2 Sam. 2:7; Ezek. 22:14, etc.), reminds us of the words of Zechariah's contemporary and colleague, whose voice was now silenced by death: "Be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith Jehovah; and be strong, O Joshua, son of Jehozadak, the high priest; and be strong, all ye people of the land, and work" (Hag. 2:4)—though here, in the 8th chapter of Zechariah, the phrase is used as an exhortation not merely or especially to the continuation of the building of the temple, as is the case in Haggai, but with reference to their doing, individually and collectively, the will of God in all things,

"These words" refer particularly to the words of promise which had just been uttered by Zechariah in the preceding verses of this chapter, and by Haggai in the prophecy from which I have just quoted, who are together spoken of as "the prophets" who were God's mouthpieces to the people since a beginning was made by them in rebuilding the temple, and are thus contrasted with the "former prophets" to whom Zechariah so often refers.

The word l'hibanoth, ("that it might be built"), is added as a more precise definition of the time to which the prophet refers in the expression, "in the day that the foundation of the house of Jehovah of hosts was laid"; for there had, in fact, been two beginnings, or foundation-layings, of the temple. Already, in the seventh month of the very year of the return of the first colony of exiles, under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua the high priest, the altar of Jehovah was rebuilt, and the sacrificial service restored in Jerusalem; and in the second month of the second year the foundation was laid amid solemn and joyous scenes described in the 3rd chapter of Ezra. But very soon difficulties and hindrances came in the way. There were the Samaritans and their intrigues and accusations at the Persian Court; and there were the still more insidious and dangerous enemies in their own midst, and in their own hearts—namely, the selfish love of ease and comfort, and their unwillingness to devote their time and means to the building of the house of God, because they wanted to build "ceiled houses" for themselves (Hag. 1:3-5). And so they neglected the work, excusing themselves that "the time is not come, the time that Jehovah's house should be built"; with the result that for about thirteen years the work which they began was suspended and "lay waste." But in the second year of Darius the king the word of Jehovah came to Haggai and Zechariah, whose rebukes, exhortations, and appeals, "in the Name of the God of Israel" (Ezra 5:1, 2), roused the people to make a new beginning, and then it was that they took up the task "with set purpose of heart" l'hibanoth—"that it might be built" (Hag. 1:12-15).

And with "the day" in which they set their hearts to obey the voice of Jehovah their God in this matter, there began a new epoch in the history of the remnant of the people, and their leaders, for "from this day will I bless you," saith Jehovah (Hag. 2:19).

Then there follows a contrast between the time before they obeyed the voice of Jehovah their God and took up work of building the temple, and the condition of things since they hearkened to the voice of the Word of God through Haggai and Zechariah. Before, when they cared only for their own affairs, nothing prospered with them, and there was nothing but disaster and disappointment: "For before those days there was no hire (or 'wages') for man, nor any hire for beast" so little was the produce that it did not pay the labor of man and beast; which answers to the description of those same days by Haggai: "Ye have sown much, and bring in little; eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; and he that earneth wages earneth wages to put into a bag with holes" (Hag. 1:6). And not only so, but (to return to our passage in Zechariah) "for him that went out and for him that came in (literally) there was no peace, because of the adversary" which is most probably a true and graphic description of the conditions which then prevailed; for, to quote words from another writer, "in such an empire as the Persian there was large scope for actual hostility among the petty nations subject to it; so that they did not threaten revolt against itself, or interfere with the payment of tribute, as in the Turkish Empire now."

On the rebuilding of the walls (a little later) we actually read that "the adversaries"—i.e., the Samaritans, Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites—conspired to fight against Jerusalem, and to slay the Jews, but were frustrated because the Lord's protection was now over the little remnant of the people.

And not only was there no peace "in those days" to him that went out and to him that came in, because of the adversary without, but the misery was increased because there was strife and contention which prevailed among themselves, for "the Lord hath set (vaashallach) all men every one against his neighbor." But now, having entered on the path of obedience, and made God's service their delight, God was going to "make their wants His care": "But now I will not be unto this people as in the former days, saith Jehovah of hosts. For there shall be the seed of peace" (or, the seed of peace even); "the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew" which reminds us somewhat of the promise in Hos. 2:21, 22: "And it shall come to pass in that day, I will answer, saith Jehovah, I will answer the heavens, and they shall answer the earth; and the earth shall answer the corn, and the wine, and the oil" etc.

And not only shall the blessing of the Lord resting on their toil produce plentiful harvests and abundant vintage, but no one shall despoil them of these gifts of God's bountifulness.

"And I will cause the remnant of this people to inherit all these things"

And the improvement in the condition of the restored remnant since they set themselves earnestly to the task of building God's house, was only a pledge of the greater things which God has promised them, and which yet await their fulfilment in the day of Israel's national restoration and conversion, as announced by the prophet in the first part of this chapter. The whole may be said to be summed up in the words in the 13th verse: "And it shall come to pass that, as ye were a curse among the nations, O house of Judah and house of Israel, so will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing: fear not, let your hands be strong"

Here we note first of all how both "Judah" and "Israel"—i.e., the entire nation, which had previous to the Exile been for a time divided into two kingdoms—are after the partial restoration from Babylon, included in divided unity in one common destiny, both of wretchedness and blessedness. Together they are, during the Lo-ammi period—the time during which God's face is averted from them—"a curse," for the solemn and terrible words which He spoke through Jeremiah have been literally fulfilled in the whole nation: "I will give them up to be tossed to and fro among all the kingdoms of the earth for evil; to be a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse, in all places wherein I shall drive them" (Jer. 24:9, 42:18).

But, as they have been together in their entirety "a curse," or the object of curse, i.e., so smitten of God as to serve the object of curses, and "the nations when imprecating curses on their foes were wont to wish them the fate of Israel" (C. H. H. Wright)—and not only so, but as the unbelieving majority of the nation had also actually and actively in the period of their separation from God and bitter hostility to their Messiah and His gospel been a curse to the nations—so says Jehovah, "will I save you" (not only from your captivity, but from your sin; not only from your outward enemies and oppressors, but from the evil of your own hearts—from yourselves), "and ye shall be a blessing." This glorious promise is to be understood, not only as "equivalent to being so blessed as to be used as a benedictory formula" (Keil), but is a revival and an application of the original promise to Abraham, "thou shalt be a blessing" as Pusey well observes, and reiterates the oft-expressed purpose of God to make saved and blessed Israel the source and instrument of blessing to all the nations of the earth, even as we read in Isa. 19:24, "In that day shall Israel be . . . a blessing in the midst of the land"; and Ezek. 34:26, "I will make them and the places round about My hill a blessing"

In measure this has already been the case, for all the great blessings which have come to the world have come to it through the seed of Abraham; "for of them," to quote another, "according to the flesh Christ came, Who is over all God blessed forever: of them were the apostles and evangelists, of them every writer of God's Word; of them those who carried the gospel throughout the whole world." (Pusey) But, so far, the blessing which has come through Israel to the world has been only partial, and has extended only to individuals; but when Israel as a nation is "saved in Jehovah with an everlasting salvation," and their hearts are set aflame with love to the long-rejected Messiah and zeal for His cause, then "the receiving of them" shall indeed be "as life from the dead" to the whole world, and the great Messianic blessings shall universally be spread by them throughout the whole earth. In Abraham and his seed—which includes Christ and Israel—shall all the families of the earth be blessed.

And it is God's faithfulness and the steadfastness of His purpose which form the grounds for our hope of His certain fulfilment of His promises. This is brought out in vv. 14 and 15: "For thus saith the Lord of hosts: As I thought to do evil unto you, when your fathers provoked Me to wrath, saith the Lord of hosts, and I repented not; so again have I thought in these days to do good unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: fear ye not."

The remnant of Israel to whom Zechariah spoke knew from their own experience that Jehovah is faithful—yes, faithful in carrying out His threatenings as well as in fulfilling His promises; for when, after repeated warnings, their fathers continued in their impenitent provocations of Him through their many sins, the "evil" which He fore-announced that He would do unto them came. They may, therefore, be assured that when He announces to them through the prophet that His thoughts toward them now are "thoughts of peace and not of evil," and that His purpose "in these days" is "to do good unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah," He will not repent or prove false to His word. This passage again reminds us of Jer. 32—a scripture which, as we observed before, is in some respects parallel to Zech. 7 and 8, where we read (v. 42): "Thus saith Jehovah: Like as I have brought all this great evil upon this people, so will I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them"

But these great promises of God, to be experimentally realized, must be responded to by the faith and obedience of God's people, and, as has been well said. "God's covenanted grace leads those truly blessed by it to holiness, not to licentiousness." Hence the exhortation to practical godliness which follows in vv. 16 and 17:

"These are the things (debharim, literally, 'words') which ye shall do: Speak ye every man the truth with his neighbor; truth and judgment of peace judge ye in your gates: and let none of you imagine evil in your hearts against his neighbor, and love no false oath: for all these are the things that I hate, saith Jehovah"; which is an inspired repetition and application of the preaching of the former prophets, which Zechariah had already summarized in ch. 7:9, 10, an exposition of which will be found in my notes on those verses. I would only here add that the mishpat shalom, "judgment of peace," which they are exhorted to judge "in their gates" (the place where justice and judgment were wont to be administered, Deut. 16:18, 21:19, etc.), means "judgment which issues in peace," or "such an administration of justice as tends to promote peace and establish concord between those that are at strife." (Keil)

The sins enumerated in the 17th verse which are contrary to "truth and peace" are emphatically described as the very things which God hates, eth kol-elleh asher sanethi—as if He meant to say, "This is the sum of what I hate"; for they sum up in brief the breaches of both tables of the law—that which sets forth man's duty to God, and that which sets forth his duty to his fellow-man.

And because God hates these sins we, too, must hate them, for "religion consists in conformity to God's nature, that we should love what God loves and hate what God hates."

We now come to the last of the four sections into which the whole of chs. 7 and 8 are divided. Here we have the direct positive part of the reply to the original question by the deputation from Bethel (ch. 7:1-3) to ask whether there was still occasion to observe the fasts which had been appointed to celebrate the anniversaries of the destruction of the Temple and the desolation of the land by the Chaldeans: "And the word of Jehovah of hosts came unto me, saying, Thus saith Jehovah of hosts: The fast (or 'fasting') of the fourth, and the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth (months) shall be (or 'become') to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and cheerful feasts—moadim tobhim ('good seasons,' or 'holidays'); therefore love truth and peace." The fast of the ninth day of the fourth month was instituted to celebrate the taking of the city by Nebuchadnezzar in the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign (Jer. 52:6-7); the fast of the fifth month (the blackest day of all in the Jewish calendar) commemorates the destruction of both the city and the Temple (Jer. 52:12-13), and many other calamities which, according to Jewish tradition, happened on this same day; the fast of the seventh month, as already stated in the exposition of ch. 7, was appointed for the murder of Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:25-26, Jer. 41:1-3); and the fast of the tenth commemorated the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem on the tenth day of that month in the ninth year of Zedekiah (2 Kings. 25:1, Jer. 39:1, Ezek. 24:1-2).

All these days are still observed as fasts by the Jewish nation in all parts of the earth, for it is still the night of weeping for Israel, and Zion still sits desolate and mourns.

But the long night of weeping is to be followed by a morning of joy, when Jehovah shall accomplish the "good" which He has purposed and promised to Israel and Jerusalem (vv. 14, 15), and then the former troubles and calamities shall be "forgotten" (Isa. 65:16), and the very days which commemorate them shall be turned into "joy and gladness" and moadim tobhim—cheerful feasts or sacred festivals. "Therefore," the prophet turns again to the remnant whom he was addressing, "love ha-emet ve ha-shalom—truth and peace"—for the promises of future blessedness and glory, whether national in relation to Israel, or spiritual in relation to the individual believer in Christ, are intended in every case to act as incentives to holiness of life and consecration to God's service in the present; and though God's covenants and promises to the nation are unconditional, and "without repentance," or any change of mind as far as He is concerned, and are not made to depend on Israel's goodness or righteousness, yet righteousness, truth, and love must be blessed fruit of these promises.

What the consequence of Jehovah's dwelling in the midst of Israel will be to the other nations, and how Israel's blessing will react upon the whole earth, we see in the last four verses of our chapter.

"Thus saith Jehovah of hosts: It shall yet come to pass" (or, "it shall yet be")—however unlikely it may have appeared in the eyes of the remnant of the people to whom Zechariah prophesied, and however "wonderful" or impossible it may appear in our eyes—"that there shall come peoples" (a collective and representative name for all peoples), "and the inhabitants of many (or 'great') cities: and the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily (literally, 'going, let us go'—or 'let us go on and on,' i.e., 'perseveringly until we attain' the blessed goal) to entreat the favor (literally, to 'entreat the face') of Jehovah, and to seek Jehovah"—to which the ready and glad response of those invited will be, "I will go also—and many peoples and strong nations shall come to seek Jehovah of hosts in Jerusalem, and to entreat the face of Jehovah"—all which is but an iteration by the central figure in the group of post-exilic prophets of the glorious announcements concerning "the latter days" made by the former prophets. Thus, for instance, we read both in Isaiah and in Micah, "And it shall come to pass in the latter days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many peoples shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isa. 2:2, 3, R.V.).

The allegorizing commentators, according to whom "the literal fulfilment of such passages is a sheer impossibility" (C. H. H. Wright)—as if it had not been foretold in this very scripture that the fulfilment of the great and glorious things which are here prophesied would appear too "wonderful" and impossible in the eyes of men—would have us believe that what is predicted by Isaiah, and Micah, and Zechariah (indeed, by all the prophets) in reference to the universal spread of the knowledge of Jehovah through the instrumentality of Israel, has already been fulfilled, or is now exhaustively fulfilling itself in this gospel dispensation.

Thus one of them, commenting on these verses, writes: "Zechariah describes vividly the eagerness and mutual impulse with which not only many, but mighty nations should throng to the gospel, and every fresh conversion should win others also, till the great tide should sweep through the world."

"The inhabitants of one city shall go to another." It is one unrelenting extension of the faith, the restlessness of faith and love. 'They shall not be satisfied with their own salvation, careless about the salvation of others; they shall employ all labor and industry, with wondrous love, to provide for the salvation of others as if it were their own.' It is a marvellous stirring of minds. Missionary efforts, so familiar with us as to be a household word, were unknown then. The time was not yet come. Before the faith in Christ came, the Jewish people were not to be the converters of mankind. They were to await Him, the Redeemer of the world, through Whom and to Whom they were to be first converted, and then the world through those who were of them. This mutual conversion was absolutely unknown. The prophet predicts certainly that it would be, and in God's time it was. 'From you,' Paul writes to a small colony in Greece, 'sounded out the Word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place your faith to Godward is spread abroad. Your faith,' he writes to the heathen capital of the world, 'is spoken of throughout the whole world.' Within eighty years after our Lord's ascension the Roman governor of Bithynia reported, on occasion of the then persecution, that it spread as a contagion. 'The contagion of that superstition traversed not cities only, but villages and scattered houses too.' Before the persecution the temples had been desolated, the solemn rites long intermitted, the sacrificed animals had very rarely found a purchaser. An impostor of the same date says: 'Pontus is full of atheists and Christians.' 'There is no one race of men,' it was said before the middle of the second century, 'whether barbarians, or Greeks, or by whatsoever name called, whether of those wandering, homeless tribes who live in wagons, or those pastoral people who dwell in tents, in which there are not prayers and eucharists to the Father and Creator of all things, through the name of the crucified Jesus.' 'The word of our teacher,' said another, 'abode not in Judea alone, as philosophy in Greece; but was poured out throughout the whole world, persuading Greeks and barbarians in their several nations and villages and every city—whole houses and each hearer individually—and having brought over to the truth no few even of the very philosophers; and if any ordinary magistrate forbid the Greek philosophy, forthwith it vanishes, but our teaching forthwith, at its first announcement, kings and emperors and subordinate rulers and governors, with all their mercenaries and countless multitudes, forbid, and war against us and try to extirpate, but it rather flourishes.'" (Pusey—The quotations are from Justin Martyr, Trypho, Clemen of Alexandria and Tertullian)

That there is a measure of truth in all this no one will gainsay, nor can any one deny the fact of the marvellous, rapid spread of the gospel in the first two or three Christian centuries, through those Jewish apostles and messengers whose hearts were all aflame with love and zeal for their all-glorious Redeemer, and through their first converts from among the Gentiles. But what about the subsequent history of the professing Church? Has it continued in its first love? Has it "gone on and on" in faith and purity, and in zeal for Christ's cause and the salvation of men? Alas! instead of converting the world, the Gentile Church became more and more merged into the world, and their candlesticks of corporate testimony were one by one removed from the earth. Not as if the Word of God has failed in that whereto it was sent: a people for

His Name from among the Gentiles—a multitude which no man can number, out of all nations, and kindreds, and tongues have been, and are being, gathered into the fold of the One Great Shepherd. But this dispensation, according to the predictions of Christ and His apostles, instead of ending in the universal knowledge of God, and in peace and righteousness among the nations, is to end in almost universal apostasy and failure, and in the greatest conflict among the nations that the world has yet known.

Beside this, what is here predicted is something which, as we have seen, is to take place subsequent to the restoration and national conversion of Israel. Has that yet taken place? No; as we observed in the notes on ch. 2, it is only ignorance of God's plan and self-delusion which can boast of the gradual conversion of the world, and speak of "Christian nations" in this present dispensation. But when Jehovah will have mercy upon Jacob, and will yet choose Israel again and set them in their own land—when, after the long centuries of darkness and unbelief the eyes of the blind shall be opened and Israel nationally is converted, and the heart of each of them is fired with that love and zeal which burned in the heart of Paul after the Lord revealed Himself to him, saying: "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest"—then this prediction of Zechariah shall be fulfilled, and "many peoples and strong nations shall come and seek Jehovah of hosts in Jerusalem, and to entreat the face of Jehovah"; and the still more ancient promise shall be realized: "As truly as I live, saith Jehovah, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of Jehovah," "for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jehovah, as the waters cover the sea." (Num. 14:21, Isa. 11:9)

All this is confirmed and brought to a climax in the last verse: "Thus saith Jehovah of hosts: In those days it shall come to pass that ten men out of all the languages of the nations shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you, for we have heard that Jehovah is with you."

Ten is used in Scripture for an indefinite number (Gen. 31:7, Lev. 26:26, Num. 14:22, 1 Sam. 1:8); here it stands for "a great and complete multitude." The unusual Hebrew phrase, mikol leshonoth haggoyim—"of all the languages of the nations"—is an echo of Isa. 66:18, where we read that "all nations and tongues" (or "languages"—haggoyim vehalleshonoth) shall be gathered to see God's glory in Jerusalem. They shall lay hold on the khenaph, which is the corner of the long flowing garment worn in the East. Among the Jews, to each of the four kenaphayim of the outer garment of white, the tsitsith, "fringes," or tassels (of blue) were attached; and some writers have supposed that this is what is referred to, since it was the distinctly visible sign of "a man, a Jew." It is spoken of as being laid (or caught) hold of, first with a view to detain the Jew, so as to beg his permission to accompany him. But it has the sense of keeping firm hold, expressive of the earnest determination of the Gentile seekers of Jehovah to accompany the Jew, who is himself represented as travelling towards Zion, with his face turned thitherward. Like Ruth, the Moabitess, to her Jewish mother-in-law, so the Gentile converts to the God of Israel shall say: "Entreat us not to leave Thee, or to return from following after Thee: for whither Thou goest we will go: . . . , Thy people shalt be our people, and Thy God our God" "We will go with you, for we have heard that Jehovah is with you"

It is because the Jew shall then not only "believe in one God" (which is their boast now), but shall be so one with God that for a Gentile convert to call himself by the name of Jacob will be equivalent to saying, "I am the Lord's"; and to surname himself "by the name of Israel," equal to "subscribing with his hand unto Jehovah" (Isa. 44:1-5). It is because the glorious hope and promise contained in the Name "Immanuel" shall then be fulfilled in a literal and personal sense to Israel nationally, and Jehovah Himself, the Holy One of Israel, in the Person of their Messiah Jesus, shall dwell in the midst of them; and because, finally, Qodesh I' Yehovah—"Holiness (or 'holy') unto Jehovah"—shall then be written upon their foreheads, yea, upon all that they possess, that the Gentiles shall honor and reverence them "as the priests of Jehovah, the ministers of our God" (Isa. 61:10), and cleave unto them as the appointed messengers of salvation and instruments of blessing, saying, "We will go with you, for we have heard that Jehovah is with you."

A pledge and prophecy of it we have in the history of the gospel in this dispensation, for it is a remarkable and wonderful fact that "the religion introduced by a Jew, the religion which consists of faith in the person of One who was indeed a Jew—namely, our blessed Lord—is that which has been embraced" by multitudes from among the Gentiles. Those are, therefore, not far wrong who have interpreted the words "a man, a Jew," of Christ; for although, as the whole context shows, it is not primarily and directly of the Messiah, but of the Jews in the days of their future blessing, that this prophecy is spoken; yet, as we have seen, it is only when Israel shall be the Messianic people and the representatives of Christ among the nations, Who will then be the King of the Jews, that this prophecy will be fulfilled. In this connection it is interesting to observe that even the Jews saw a reference in this scripture to the Messiah. Thus in an ancient Midrash we read: "All nations shall come, falling on their faces before the Messiah, and the Israelites saying, Grant that we may be Thy servants, and of Israel. For, as relates to the doctrine and the knowledge of the law, the Gentiles shall be their servants, according as it is written: 'In those days it shall come to pass that ten men shall take hold out of all the languages of the nations, shall even take hold of the skirts of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you.'" (Pesikta Rabbathai)

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What restorations are spoken of here?

Hos. 2:19-20

Zech. 8:8

Zechariah 9:1-17

The overthrow of world-power, and the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom, may be given as the epitome of the last chapters of Zechariah, to which we have now come. The two oracles which make up the whole of the second half of the book (chs. 9-11 and 12-14) show by their headings, as well as by their contents, and even by their formal arrangement, that they are corresponding portions of a greater whole. Both sections treat of war between the heathen world and Israel, though in different ways.

In the first (chs. 9-11), the judgment through which Gentile world-power over Israel is finally destroyed, and Israel is endowed with strength to overcome all their enemies, forms the fundamental thought and center of gravity of the prophetic description. In the second (chaps. 12-14), the judgment through which Israel itself is sifted and purged in the final great conflict with the nations, and transformed into the holy nation of Jehovah, forms the leading topic.

"The formal or structural resemblance between the two long oracles into which the last six chapters divide themselves appears also in the fact that in the center of each the announcement suddenly takes a different tone without any external preparation (chs. 11:1 and 13:7), so that it appears as if it were the commencement of a new prophecy; and it is only by a closer study that the connection of the whole is brought out and the relation between the two is clearly seen—namely, that the second section contains a more minute description of the manner in which the events announced in the first section are to be realized. In the threatening word concerning the land of Hadrach, chaps. 9 and 10 form the first section, ch. 11 the second. In that concerning Israel the first section extends from ch. 12:1 to 13:6, and the second from ch. 13:7 to the end of the book." (Keil)

Chs. 9 and 10, as has just been observed, go together and form a continuous prophecy. The foreground, or more immediate future, to which it refers, is the course of the victories of Alexander the Great, "which circled round the Holy Land without hurting it," and ended in the overthrow of the Persian Empire—through the foreground merges, as we shall see, into solemn events both of judgment and of mercy of a more distant future.

The prophecy begins with the word (massa), which the Authorized Version, together with all the ancient versions (with the exception of the Septuagint), have rendered "burden"; but the majority of modern scholars translate simply "oracle," or "utterance," or "sentence."

It is not necessary to enter here into a long critical examination of the actual force of this word when used as a superscription to prophetic utterances; but it is certainly true that (massa), which is from the verb (nasa) "to lift," or "take up," as a man takes up a burden, "is never placed in the title," as is observed already by Jerome, "save when the vision is heavy, and full of burden and toil."

It is used by Isaiah entirely as the heading to the prophecies which contain threatenings and announce judgments against the nations who have acted as oppressors of Israel (Isa. 13:1, 14:28, 15:1, 17:1, 19:1, 21:1, 11, 13, 22:1, 23:1), and in Nahum it forms the introductory formula to the prophetic description of the destruction of Nineveh. In short, in ordinary Hebrew "massa is unquestionably used in the sense of a burden, and the prophecies to which it is affixed are mainly prophecies of woe and disaster." Here, moreover (in Zech. 9:1 and in ch. 12:1), massa does not stand alone as the introductory formula, as is the case in Isaiah and Nahum, but is followed by (debhar Jehovah), "the word of Jehovah"; as is the case also in Mal. 1:1, which begins, "The burden of the word of Jehovah to Israel"

When the fulfillment of this prophecy takes place "upon Hadrach and Damascus, and the wrath of God descends upon those cities and districts, the eyes of the nations, as well as those of the people of Israel, will look toward Jehovah, and marvel at the wonders of judgment which will then be performed in their sight, in accordance with the solemn warnings of the prophet."

In Isa. 17 we have a somewhat parallel prediction of men's eyes, and specially of the eyes of Israel, being turned to God as the result of judgment, and there also it is primarily coupled with the burden, or oracle, against Damascus: "In that day" we read, "shall a man look unto his Maker, and his eyes shall have respect to the Holy One of Israel; and he shall not look to the altars, the work of his hands, neither shall he have respect to that which his fingers have made"—a passage which reminds us also of the language of the godly remnant in the 26th chapter: "Yea, in the way of Thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for Thee: to Thy Name and to Thy Memorial is the desire of our soul. With my soul have I desired Thee in the night; yea, with my spirit within me will I seek Thee early: for when Thy judgments are in the earth the inhabitants of the world learn righteousness." (Isa. 17:1-8, Isa. 26:8-9)

But to proceed to the 2nd verse: "And Hamath, also, which bordereth thereon"—i.e., on Damascus—shall be involved in the like fate, and share in the burden of wrath of which Damascus is the "resting-place."

There was a district or small kingdom in Syria, as well as a city of that name (which was its capital), the present Hamath, and, within its bounds "in the land of Hamath" Riblah was situated, associated in Jewish memory with terrible sufferings and humiliations at the hands of their conquering foes (2 Kings 23:33, 25:6, 7, 20, 21).

Then, having spoken of the two capital cities which represent Syria, the prophet proceeds to speak of the two capitals of Phoenicia: "Tyre and (or 'with') Sidon, because (or 'although') she is very wise"

How Tyre especially showed her worldly wisdom, and the great material prosperity which she attained thereby, we see in the 3rd verse: "And Tyre built herself a stronghold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the street."

But worldly wisdom, natural strength, and material resources are of no avail if it is the Lord who rises in judgment against us; and that is true of nations as of individuals.

"Behold, the Lord will dispossess her, and He shall smite her power (or 'her wealth') in the sea; and she shall be devoured with fire." "Behold" (hinneh), by which word our special attention is directed to something very important. "Behold," though Tyre is so wise, so doubly strong, so rich—yea, even though her strength were a hundred times as great, and she enclosed herself in a hundred strong walls of one hundred and fifty feet high, "the Lord will dispossess her"; for cities or peoples cannot barricade themselves against God, and "it is altogether useless to build strongholds to keep Him out." It was the Lord who did it through Alexander, whom He used as His scourge against Phoenicia and the Persian power at that time.

"If the reference of a prophecy can be judged of by the event," says another writer, "there can be no doubt whatever to what period this prophecy must refer. The judgments denounced against Damascus, Hadrach, and Hamath are expressed in such general terms that several events which occurred at very different periods might be adduced as fulfillments of the prophecy. But the prophecies referring to Tyre were not accomplished until the capture and destruction of that city by Alexander the Great. Tyre was unsuccessfully attacked, during the supremacy of the Assyrian power, by Shalmaneser. It was again besieged for many years by Nebuchadnezzar, and it is still a matter of doubt whether it was actually taken by that monarch. It is, indeed, highly probable that Nebuchadnezzar, though he failed in his attack on the island fortress, was so far successful as to gain possession of the city on the mainland, which was possibly denuded of all that was valuable, and that the Tyrians after the loss of the city on the mainland made peace with the Chaldean monarch on favorable terms. But it is certain that if Tyre were captured at all by Nebuchadnezzar, it was not then burned with fire—her sea-girt fortress was not destroyed nor her naval power ruined. Though she may have lost her independence, she did not lose the important position she occupied as the greatest commercial and naval city in the world, and the naval power of the Phoenicians proved in the Persian period of the greatest possible importance to that empire.

"The case was very different when Alexander the Great, having completely shattered the might of Persia in the decisive battle of Issus, marched with his victorious army into Syria. Alexander directed the main division of his army against Phoenicia, while he dispatched Parmenio with a strong detachment to operate against Damascus. Damascus, where Darius had deposited his riches, opened its gates to that general, who overran all the land of Hadrach, and must also necessarily have occupied Hamath, which probably submitted without a struggle. Sidon surrendered without making any resistance; but Tyre, after a vain attempt at negotiation, ventured to resist.

"Proudly confident in the strength of their island fortress, the Tyrians mocked the attempts of Alexander to reduce their city. Every engine of war suited for defense had been stored up in their bulwarks, and every device which their skilful engineers could suggest was had recourse to, and for a time with marked success. 'Ye despise this land army through confidence in the place that ye dwell in is an island, but I will show you that ye dwell on a continent,' was the language of Alexander. The shallow channel between the mainland and the island was at last bridged over by a huge dam of earth erected after repeated failures, and the city which had stood a five years' siege from the Assyrians, a thirteen years' siege from the Chaldeans, was taken after a short siege of seven months by Alexander. Ten thousand of its brave defenders were either massacred or crucified, the rest were sold into slavery, and none escaped save those who were concealed by the Sidonians in the ships." O. Curtius adds distinctly that 'Alexander having slain all save those who fled to the temples, ordered the houses to be set on fire.'

In the last sentence in the 8th verse, "For now have I seen with Mine eyes," we have an echo and reminiscence of Ex. 3:7: 'I have surely seen (or 'seeing I have seen') the affliction of My people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows'; where also the word "for I have seen" stands in connection with Israel's affliction at the hands of their "taskmasters," which is the same word in plural form as rendered "oppressor" in Zech. 9:8. Yes, the God who delivered Israel from under the oppression of Egypt, and with Whom only to "see" the afflictions of His people is to be moved with compassion for their sorrows, will yet again look "with His own eyes," and interpose, and deliver them from the power of their oppressors; which promise, whatever the more immediate reference, will not be exhaustively fulfilled until the final national deliverance of Israel, of which the deliverance from Egypt is regarded in the prophetic Scriptures as a type, and until the final overthrow of the enemies of God and of His people, of which the overthrow of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea was a foreshadowing.

With regard to the special fulfilment of the prediction in the 8th verse in the more immediate future from the prophet's point of view, let me remind my readers of the account given by Josephus of the remarkable episode in Alexander's march through Palestine, which agrees also with traditions preserved in the Talmud and Midrashic literature. At the commencement of his campaign against Phoenicia, Alexander the Great sent messengers to the Jewish high priest in Jerusalem demanding aid from the Jews and the payment of the tribute which they used to pay to the King of Persia. The high priest, however, refused to break the oath of fidelity which he had sworn to Darius, and Alexander in consequence threatened to inflict a severe chastisement on Jerusalem as soon as he had captured Tyre, and reduced the Philistine strongholds.

"Now Alexander, when he had taken Gaza, made haste to go up to Jerusalem; and Jaddua the high priest, when he heard that, was in an agony, and under terror, as not knowing how he should meet the Macedonians, since the king was displeased at his foregoing disobedience.

"He therefore ordained that the people should make supplications, and should join with him in making sacrifices to God, whom he besought to protect that nation, and to deliver them from the perils that were coming upon them; whereupon God warned him in a dream, which came upon him after he had offered sacrifice, that he should take courage, and adorn the city, and open the gates; that the rest should appear in white garments, but that he and the priests should meet the king in the habits proper to their order, without the dread of any ill consequences, which the providence of God would prevent. Upon which, when he rose from his sleep, he greatly rejoiced; and declared to all the warning he had received from God. According to which dream he acted entirely, and so waited for the coming of the king.

"And when he understood that he was not far from the city, he went out in procession with the priests and the multitude of the citizens. The procession was venerable, and the manner of it different from that of other nations. It reached to a place called Sapha, which name, translated into Greek, signifies a prospect; for you have thence a prospect both of Jerusalem and of the Temple. And when the Phoenicians and the Chaldeans that followed him thought they should have liberty to plunder the city and torment the high priest to death—which the king's displeasure fairly promised them—the very reverse of it happened; for Alexander, when he saw the multitude at a distance in white garments, while the priests stood clothed in fine linen, and the high priest in purple and scarlet clothing—with his mitre on his head—having the golden plate whereon the name of God was engraved, he approached by himself, and adored that name, and first saluted the high priest. The Jews also did altogether, with one voice, salute Alexander and encompass him about; whereupon the kings of Syria and the rest were surprised at what Alexander had done, and supposed him disordered in his mind. However, Parmenio alone went up to him and asked him how it came to pass that, when all others adored him, he should adore the high priest of the Jews? To whom he replied, 'I did not adore him, but that God who hath honored him with his high priesthood; for I saw this very person in a dream, in this very habit, when I was at Dios in Macedonia, who, when I was considering with myself how I might obtain the dominion of Asia, exhorted me to make no delay, but boldly to pass over the sea to that place, for that he would conduct my army, and would give me the dominion over the Persians; whence it is, that having seen no other in that habit, and now seeing this person in it, and remembering that vision, and the exhortation which I had in my dream, I believe that I bring this army under Divine conduct, and shall therewith conquer Darius and destroy the power of the Persians, and that all things will succeed according to what is in my own mind.

"And when he had said this to Parmenio, and had given the high priest his right hand, the priests ran along by him and he came into the city; and when he went up to the Temple, he offered sacrifice to God according to the high priest's direction, and magnificently treated both the high priest and the priests. And when the Book of Daniel was showed him wherein Daniel declared that one of the Greeks should destroy the empire of the Persians, he supposed that himself was the person intended; and as he was then glad, he dismissed the multitude for the present, but the next day he called them to him and bade them ask what favors they pleased of him; whereupon the high priest desired that they might enjoy the laws of their forefathers and might pay no tribute on the seventh year." (Josephus)

Israel's Prince of Peace and His Mission in the World

From the victorious progress of the great Gentile world-conqueror, with his great army, which God uses as His rod to chastise the peoples and cities enumerated in the first verses of this chapter; and from the deliverance of the people and land of Israel by Jehovah, who would camp round about His house with an invisible host, "because of him who passeth by, and because of him that returneth" (the primary reference of which, as we have seen, was to a more immediate future)—the prophet passes to the true King of Israel, whose strength rests not in chariots and horses, or in the multitude of an host; and to the great deliverance and salvation which He shall bring, not only to Israel, but to "the nations."

And it is quite in keeping with the character of Old Testament prophecy that there is no perspective observed, nor clear indications given of the pauses and intervals between the different stages and acts by which Messiah's work would be accomplished, and His Kingdom finally established. Like the traveler who from a great distance beholds a whole mountain range as one mountain, without discerning the different peaks, with the long valleys between, so do the Old Testament seers often behold Messiah's Person and Mission without clearly discerning from their distant point of view the interval between the sufferings and the glory that should follow. And not only are their eyes always fixed on the distant and ultimate future, and the final great national and spiritual deliverance of Israel at the time of the end, but the distant future was always connected by them with the more immediate or proximate future. Every promised deliverance they regarded as a pledge of the final great deliverance, and in every redemption which God wrought for His people they saw already the last great redemption which was to be brought to the world by the advent of the Messiah. This we must bear in mind as we proceed to examine the prophecy which is now before us.

But let us approach the Scripture itself. In view of the magnitude and the joyful character of the announcement about to be made, the prophet exclaims, "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem" which reminds us of the similar summons in the first part of this book: "Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith Jehovah" (Zech. 2:10) which again is an inspired post-exilic echo of the joyous proclamation with which the Book of Immanuel (Isa. 7-12 has been appropriately so styled) closes: "Cry aloud and, shout, thou inhabitress of Zion: for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee." But when the infinite Jehovah, the Holy One of Israel, whom no man hath seen, or can see, manifests Himself, and comes visibly to dwell in the midst of His people, it is always in the person of the Messiah, and the "Lo, I come, and will dwell in the midst of thee," is explained therefore by the equivalent announcement, "Behold, thy King (Messiah) cometh unto thee."

The coming of the King, which is announced in our passage in Zech. 9 is, however, a different one from the coming foretold in the passages quoted from Isa. 12 and Zech. 2. For although, as already stated, there is no perspective observed in Old Testament prophecy, and the two advents of the Messiah are often seen and spoken of by the prophets as one, we know now, in the fuller light of the partial fulfilment, that there is a coming of the Redeemer first in humiliation to suffer and die, before He shall come again a second time in divine majesty to reign over this earth, and to fulfil in a literal sense the hope and promise contained in the name "Immanuel," by Himself, the God-Man, visibly dwelling "in the midst of them," so that Israel will at that time be able to say to the nations, "God is with us," not only in the spiritual sense, in which His presence is a reality to us now, but in the literal sense of having their divine Messiah-King dwelling and reigning among them.

It is to the first advent of Messiah, then, that attention is especially called by the word "Behold," in the 9th verse of the chapter we are now considering, although, as we shall see, this very prophecy looks on also to the Second Advent, and beyond the sufferings of Messiah, to the glory that should follow.

I have already, in the exposition of ch. 6:12, pointed out how the Messiah is introduced to us four different times in the Old Testament, and under four different aspects, by this word "Behold," which correspond also to the fourfold portraiture of Christ in the four Gospels. Here it is especially as Zion's King that we are called upon to contemplate Him: "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee." He does not say "a King," but "thy King"; thine own, the long-promised, the long-expected; He who, when they had kings of their own given them by God, had been promised as the King; the Righteous Ruler among men of the seed of David; He who, above all other kings, was their King and Savior, whose Kingdom was to absorb in itself all kingdoms of the earth, the King of kings and Lord of lords." (Pusey)

The ideal King of Israel is further characterized as (ani), which is rendered in the English versions "lowly," but which primarily means "poor," "afflicted." This word, as is properly observed by Hengstenberg, Keil, and others, gathers up "the whole of the lowly, miserable, suffering condition" of the righteous Servant of Jehovah, as it is elaborately depicted in Isa. 53: and those who feel themselves constrained to recognize in that great prophecy in Isaiah a vivid description of the suffering and death of the Messiah, cannot regard it as strange that Zechariah, who was doubtless acquainted with the writings of Isaiah, and who in all his Messianic passages—both in the first and second parts of his book—tersely summarizes the great predictions of "the former prophets," should be led to describe Israel's Redeemer-King as "afflicted" and suffering.

And in keeping with His character shall be the manner in which He shall present Himself to His people. Not in outward pomp or with display of worldly power, shall He appear, but "riding upon an ass, even upon a colt, the foal of an ass."

The second sentence in this line more precisely defines the kind of ass which the Messiah shall ride upon. It shall be a young animal not yet ridden on, but still accustomed to run behind the she-asses, as the last qualifying words of the description imply.

In Jeremiah's time, for instance, it was certainly regarded as becoming royal dignity for kings and princes to be "sitting in chariots and riding on horses," so that when the Messiah is here represented as "riding on an ass" (Jer. 17:25), it does suggest the idea of lowliness, in keeping with what had just been said of Him as being "poor" or "afflicted." At the same time, as there is a contrast suggested in the context between the great Gentile world-conqueror, who with his chariots and horses comes to subdue and tread down, and Israel's Redeemer-King, who comes to "speak peace," and as in the 10th verse, the horse is certainly one of the emblems of war, His riding upon an ass does also symbolize the peaceable character of His mission.

From the Messiah's humiliation, the depths of which are reached in the words "poor" or "afflicted," and "riding upon an ass" (v. 9), the prophet's vision is directed to the glory that should follow, and to the blessed results of the advent of this Redeemer-King, not only in relation to Zion and Israel, but to the whole earth:

"And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and the battle-bow shall be cut off; and He shall speak peace unto the nations: and His dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth."

As the deliverance which Israel's Prince of Peace shall bring will not be by means of chariots and horses, or by the multitude of a host, so also shall His Kingdom not be founded on worldly might; nor shall those subject to His rule have need to rely on any of these things. This is in keeping with what the Lord had already spoken through one of the earlier prophets: "I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and I will save them by (or 'in') Jehovah their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen" (Hos. 1:7) In other words, Jehovah alone, in the Person of the Messiah, shall then be the hope and confidence of His people, for "He is their Help and their Shield" (Ps. 115:9); or, as He had already said of restored Jerusalem, through Zechariah, in the third vision: "I, saith Jehovah, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and I will be the glory in the midst of her" (Zech. 2:5)—that is, her all-sufficient outward protection and inward illumination. He will, therefore, "cut off" the instruments of war and emblems of worldly power, first of all from His own people because they shall have no need of them, and lest they should still be tempted to be like the Gentile world powers, some of whom "trust in chariots and some in horses." (Ps. 20:7)

But the mission of the Jewish Messiah—the Prince of Peace—extends not only to Israel and Palestine: "He shall speak peace to the nations"—an expression which does not mean exactly that Messiah would command peace to the nations, as Koehler and others interpret; or that He "would bring about peace by compassing the disputes and quarrels of the contending nations," as some other writers understand it. The phrase daber shalom ("to speak peace"), is used in some instances in the sense of speaking that which avowedly has peace for its object, whether the profession be sincere or not (Ps. 28:3, 35:20); or simply speaking in the sense of announcing peace and the removal of hostility. Thus God is said to "speak peace to His people and to His saints." (Ps. 85:8)

It is in this latter sense, I believe, that the words are to be understood here. Israel's Redeemer-King comes to publish peace to the nations—not only peace from outward strife and conflict with one another, but that deeper inner peace, and the removal of hostility between man and God, which has been the cause of all outward restlessness and strife—though it is implied also that there is both power and authority in the word which He shall speak to bring about the blessed end which He has in view.

"And His dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth"—which is a verbal quotation by our prophet from the 72nd Psalm, where the effects of the blessed reign of the true Son of David, Israel's ideal "King," is so beautifully depicted, and where we read that "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before Him; and His enemies shall lick the dust. . . . Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him; all nations shall serve Him"

The phrase miyyam ad yam—from sea to sea—is idiomatic, and equivalent to "from the sea to the other end of the world where the sea begins again." The nahar ("river") is the Euphrates, and is mentioned as the remotest eastern boundary of the Promised Land, according to Gen. 15:18; Ex.23:31.

In short, from the Holy Land, which will then be extended to the limits originally promised to the fathers, and which will be the center of Messiah's blessed rule, His dominion will extend even "unto the ends of the earth."

Before finally taking leave of the 10th verse, we must note once more that, in keeping with the special style and characteristic of our prophet (which we had occasion to observe again and again in our study of the first half of the book), Zechariah not only bases his prophecy of Messiah's Person and Mission on the utterances about Israel's coming Redeemer of the "former prophets," but gives, so to say, a terse summary of God's previous revelations on this great theme. This indeed is one reason why this short prophetic book of only fourteen chapters is so marvellously rich in its contents; for, in addition to new Divine communications granted to this priest-prophet, we have in it, as it were, an inspired condensation, or summary, of the great prophecies and promises contained in the earlier prophets.

We have already noted the verbal quotation from the 72nd Psalm, but there are also earlier prophetic utterances which are interwoven in this inspired picture of Messiah's Person and Mission as presented by Zechariah. The chief of these is Mic. 5: "But thou, Bethlehem-Ephratah, which art little (or 'least') to be among the cities of Judah, out of thee shall One come forth unto Me that is to be Ruler in Israel; whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting And He shall stand and feed in the strength of Jehovah, in the majesty of the name of Jehovah His God: and they shall abide, for now shall He be great unto the ends of the earth. And this One shall be our peace And it shall come to pass in that day, saith Jehovah, that I will cut off thy horses out of the midst of thee, and I will destroy thy chariots, and I will cut the (walled) cities of thy land, and I will throw down all thy strong holds." (Mic. 5:2, 4, 10, 11)

Here we have a Child born in time, in a small obscure place in Palestine, and of a race despised by the other nations, whose "goings forth" are from eternity, and who would be great unto the ends of the earth, and not only be the bringer of peace, but Himself "be our peace"

And the same picture of the true Son of David and ideal King of Israel, with the same enigmatical and apparently paradoxical combination of characteristics of humiliation and helplessness on the one hand, and of power and dominion on the other, which is to spread over the whole earth, not by force of arms but by means of His simple Word, is given also by Micah's contemporary Isaiah the son of Amos (Isa. 9:1-7 R.V.), and was also doubtless in the mind of Zechariah as he spoke of the King who should appear in lowliness but would yet speak peace to the nations, and exercise a sway which would extend to the ends of the earth.

Secondly, I must once again repeat what has been stated at the beginning of my remarks on the 9th verse, that there is no perspective observed in the Old Testament prophecy, and that the prophets behold from their distant point of view the two advents of Messiah as one, not observing the different stages and long pauses in the process of the fulfilment of His mission on earth.

A pause of nearly two thousand years has already ensued between the 9th and 10th verses of this great prophecy—between the time when Jesus, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet" Zechariah, presented Himself to the daughter of Zion as her true King, "meek, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of an ass" (Matt.11:4-5), and the time when He shall "speak peace to the nations," and shall visibly "stand and feed (or 'rule') in the strength of Jehovah, in the majesty of the name of Jehovah His God."

Indeed, we know by comparing scripture with scripture that before the instruments of war shall finally be "cut off," and the Messiah is manifested as the Judge and "Reprover" of strong nations, so that they "shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks," and neither learn nor practice war any more, the greatest war which this afflicted earth has ever seen is to take place, during which time the nations will "beat their ploughshares into swords, and pruning-hooks into spears."

But this is sure and certain, that however long the pause may last, God never loses the thread of the purpose which He has formed for this earth; and as surely as the prophecies of the sufferings of Christ have been literally fulfilled, so surely will those also be which relate to His glory and reign; and although Israel and the nations have had to wait long for it, the angels' song at the birth of our Savior, "Peace on earth and goodwill toward men," will yet be realized, and Christ will not only be owned by His own people as "the King of the Jews," but His rule will extend "from sea to sea, and from the river even unto the ends of the earth."

Meanwhile, while He is still rejected on earth, He is exalted at the right hand of God in heaven; and to those who already recognize Him as King, and render to Him the glad allegiance of their hearts, He already "speaks peace," yea, a peace which passeth all understanding even in the midst of outward strife and travail—such as the world can never give nor take away.

The last seven verses of the 9th chapter (to which the whole of the 10th chapter is linked) set forth in fuller detail the results of the advent and mission of the Redeemer-King, more particularly in relation to Israel nationally. The prophet had spoken of Messiah in the 10th verse, as the One who would also "speak peace to the (Gentile) nations," whose dominion would extend even "to the ends of the earth"; now he turns again to Zion and Israel. "As for thee (or, literally, 'thou also'), by (or 'because of') the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth" (or release, or send free) "thy prisoners" (or captives: literally, "thy bound ones") "out of the pit wherein is no water."

It is the whole nation which is thus addressed, as we see from the context, where the inclusive terms "Ephraim and Judah" and "Judah and Ephraim" (Zech. 9:10, 13) are used. This is clear also from the words which follow, for the covenant which God made, whether with Abraham or with the people at the foot of Mount Sinai, included the whole people, and there was no provision or promise in it which applied to one part, or to some of the tribes and not to the others.

The primary reference of the phrase bedam berithekh—"the blood of thy covenant"—is most probably to Ex. 24., when, at the ratification of the Sinaitic covenant, we read that Moses took the blood of the slain animals in basins, and, after sprinkling half on the altar, which represented God, and half on the people, he exclaimed, "Behold, the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." (Ex. 24:8)

To that covenant Israel proved herself unfaithful; and as they still persist as a nation in taking their place before God on the ground of a broken law, and strive, though vainly, to establish a righteousness of their own, they have been permitted to have a long and bitter taste of the curses which the law proclaims against disobedience to its precepts. But though Israel proved themselves unfaithful, and this particular covenant itself was "broken" (Jer. 31:31), "the blood of the covenant" on which emphasis is laid in this prophecy, was a sign and pledge of the faithfulness of God (though all men prove liars), and typically set forth the provision which God has made by which eventually His disobedient and rebellious people would be brought back within the sphere of blessing.

But the covenant of Sinai was not the only one which God made with and for Israel; there was a much earlier one—the one He made with Abraham, which was in the nature, not of a contract between two parties, but of a promise to the fulfilment of which God alone was pledged. And in connection with that covenant, too, there was the shedding of the blood of the animals and birds which Abram was commanded to slay—which, as well as the blood-shedding on Sinai, and indeed of all the blood of the sacrifices which were "on Jewish altars slain," pointed to the great sacrifice "of nobler name," and to the much more precious blood which alone secures to sinful man God's covenanted blessings.

The antitypical (that which was foreshadowed) ratification of the covenant, therefore (whatever the primary reference of these words in Zechariah), took place when Israel's Messiah, Jesus, appeared as the "minister of the circumcision to confirm the promises made unto the fathers."

"This is My blood of the new covenant," He said, when about to lay down His life a ransom for many; and since the great sacrifice on the cross, all the promises of God, "how many so ever," or whatever they may be, whether made to Israel nationally, or intended for all men generally—ratified as they now are in His own precious blood, have become, so to say, doubly sure and certain, for "in Him is the Yea, and in Him the Amen, to the glory of God by us."

But to return to our prophecy. Because of the everlasting covenant-relationship which exists between Him and His people, sealed and ratified with blood, "I have sent forth" God says, "thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water."

The perfect tense of the verb (shillachti)—"I have sent forth," or "released"—is prophetic of what God intends to do, there being many instances in the prophetic Scriptures where the perfect is used for the future. With the eternal, unchangeable God, His promises, however distant be the set time of their fulfilment, are already as good as accomplished.

The description "prisoners" in a "pit," or "dungeon," "wherein is no water," primarily describes, figuratively, Israel's condition in captivity, out of which God, in virtue of His covenant promise, Will deliver them.

It reminds us of the description of Jacob, when given over for a time "for a spoil," and "Israel to the robbers," which we find in Isaiah: "But this is a people robbed and spoiled; they are all of them snared in holes, and they are hid in prison houses: they are for a prey, and none delivereth; for a spoil, and none saith, Restore." But though in "prison," and "robbed," and "spoiled," they are not given over to death, this being already hinted at in the expression bor ein mayim bo—"the pit (or 'dungeon') without water in it," which is an echo of Gen. 37:24 (where exactly the same phrase is found), with an evident allusion to the story of Joseph. It was with a view to save him from a violent death that Reuben proposed that Joseph should be thrown into the pit, which was doubtless a disused cistern, such being on occasion also used as dungeons. But it made all the difference to Joseph that there was no water in that pit or cistern; for had there been water in it, he would have been drowned.

So it is with Israel. They are likened to one bound and in a "pit," or "dungeon," which, alas! has also been literally the case with multitudes of Israel's sons and daughters during the period of their "captivity"; but God sees to it that there should be no water in the pit, and that His people, which is still bound to Him by covenant blood, should not utterly perish. And eventually, at the word of God, Israel, like Joseph, shall be freed from the pit and lifted from the position of humiliation and suffering to become a nation of princes on the earth.

And Israel's deliverance from national bondage will synchronize, and be, so to say, the outward sign of their still greater spiritual deliverance, for the words "prisoners" (asirim, literally, "bound ones") and "pit" (bor) are used in other scriptures to describe the condition of men, who are not only in outward bodily captivity, but who are in the bondage of sin and captives to Satan.

Thus the Messiah is anointed and sent to open the prison-gates "to them that are bound"; and in the day when Israel, by a look at their crucified Messiah, is "redeemed from all his iniquities" and experiences God's "plenteous redemption," it will be this greater spiritual deliverance that they will celebrate in words which are already familiar and precious to us who know the Messiah of Israel as our personal Redeemer.

"He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay; and He set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings" (Ps. 40:2, 3).

And there is a certain analogy in this respect between Israel and the Church, or rather between Israel in their present condition as "prisoners of hope," and those who, in and through Christ, have already set their hope upon God. We are not in outward or bodily dispersion and banishment, as Israel is; nor, praise be to God, are we in bondage to sin or Satan. In Christ we have even now "redemption by His blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace"; already we have been delivered out of the power of darkness and are translated into the kingdom of the Son of His love, and are made heirs and joint-heirs with Christ of an inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. Yet, inasmuch as we are still environed by an unrenewed creation, which, on account of man's sin, was subjected to vanity; so long as we still carry about "the body of this death" and know the motions of sin and death within us; so long as we are still in this present evil age, and not actually in our glorious promised land, and our Father's own house—we are "prisoners of hope," for not only do we still form part of that creation which groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, "but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for our adoption, the redemption of our body. For by hope are we saved; but hope that is seen is not hope: for who hopeth for that which he seeth? But if we hope for that which we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." (Rom. 8:22-25)

We are therefore longing and looking for the realization of "the Blessed Hope," namely, "the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ," who also shall bring rest and deliverance to a groaning creation and fashion anew the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of His glory, according to the working whereby He is able even to subject all things unto Himself.

But, to proceed to the second half of the 12th verse "even today" in thy present adversity and in spite of all appearances, "do I declare" (or "tell" you as good news, from which you may already draw consolation and hope) "that will render" (or "cause to return") "double unto thee."

There are several scriptures in which the word "double" occurs as expressing a principle of God's dealing with His own people. The key and explanation of it is found in His own appointment in reference to the first-born. According to the law, the first-born son inherited a double portion of his father's property as compared with the other members of the family. This, except it were forfeited by personal unfitness, or transgression, was his inalienable right. If, contrary to God's original appointment, any man of Israel had two wives, "the one beloved and the other hated, and they had borne him children, both the beloved and the hated, and if the first-born son be hers that was hated, then it shall be in the day that he causeth his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved the first-born before the son of the hated, . . . but he shall acknowledge the first-born, the son of the hated, by giving him a double portion (shenayim) of all that he hath; . . . the right of the first-born is his." An illustration of this principle we have in the case of Joseph. Reuben having, by an act of personal moral defilement, disqualified himself to inherit the birthright, it was transferred to Joseph, and as a consequence his descendants were counted as two tribes—Ephraim and Manasseh—who had two portions of the land instead of one; and Joseph himself became by this act entitled to a double portion of Jacob's personal possessions. Now Israel is God's "son," God's "first-born" in relation to the other nations, and He deals with them on the principles of His own law. In his own land, and under the protection of the Covenant-keeping God of his fathers, Israel enjoys a "double portion" of favor and blessing. But commensurate with privilege is responsibility, and of him to whom much is given much is required. Therefore when Israel sinned he was visited with "double" punishment. This is the explanation of such passages as "She hath received of the Lord's hand double" (kiphlaim—"twofold") "for all her sins"; or, "I will recompense their iniquity and their sin double" (mishneh—"a repetition"; once and again) "because they have defiled My land . . . and have filled Mine inheritance with their abominations." This is the key and explanation of the woeful history of the Jewish people during the centuries of their banishment and dispersion. This is why under the whole heaven it hath not been done as has been done upon Jerusalem; and that, as Josephus complains, Israel's sorrows and sufferings surpass that of all the rest of mankind.

But Israel's disobedience and consequent sufferings are not to last forever. Even in their dispersion they are, as we have seen, "prisoners of the hope," and when restored to their land and brought back into favor as God's "firstborn" among the nations, then "for their shame they shall have double"—mishneh—"and for the" (or, instead of) "confusion they shall rejoice in their portion; therefore in their land they shall possess the double. Everlasting joy shall be unto them."

And it is particularly this grand prophecy in Isa. 61, to which, as it seems to me, there is this inspired reference in our passage in Zechariah when he announces to them in their then still national day of gloom that God will cause the double to return to them.

From the final results to Israel and the nations of the advent and mission of the Messiah we are in the next three verses taken back to the process.

Before Judah shall finally be saved, and Israel possess again in their land the "double" portion of blessing and privilege, Gentile world-power must be broken, and the enemies of God's kingdom be finally overthrown. The figures in vv. 13 to 15 are very bold and graphic: "For I will bend (or 'stretch') Judah for Me as a bow, and I will fill it with Ephraim; and I will stir up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and I will make thee as the sword of a mighty man. And Jehovah shall appear above them, and His arrow shall go forth as the lightning: and the Lord Jehovah shall blow the trumpet, and shall go forth (or 'march') with whirlwinds (or 'in the tempests ') of the south" Judah is the drawn bow, Ephraim the arrow, and Zion the sword in the hand of Jehovah, by means of which the foe is thoroughly subjugated.

The 15th verse illustrates the word of the Psalmist, "Through God we shall do valiantly, for He it is that shall tread down our adversaries." "Jehovah of hosts," we read, "shall defend them; and they shall devour, and they shall tread down the sling stones; and they shall drink, and make a noise as through wine: and they shall be filled like bowls, like the corners of the altar." The devouring (or "eating") and "drinking" must, of course, be understood in a figurative sense—for it is only to a perverted imagination, worthy of those who from time to time seek to revive the diabolical lie which is known by the name of the "Blood Accusation," that the thought could ever occur that the Jews did literally eat the flesh and drink the blood of their conquered adversaries.

The figure which is here before the prophet's mind is that which was used by Balaam ages before: "Behold the people (Israel) shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion. He shall not lie down till he eat the prey and drink the blood of the slain" (Num. 23:24). It is also found in Mic. 5:8: "And the remnant of Jacob shall be among the nations, in the midst of many people as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep: who, if he go through, treadeth down and teareth in pieces, and there is none to deliver."

"The idea of actually drinking blood was repugnant to the Jewish religion, and condemned in both the Law and the Prophets; but when nations are compared to wild animals, language must be used characteristic of the habits and usages of such animals." "The one thought seems to be that their enemies should cease to be, so as not to molest them any more. . . . They should disappear as completely as fuel before the fire, or food before the hungry."

The Authorized Version renders (vekha bhshu abhnei qela'), "and they shall subdue with sling stones"; but the sling stones cannot, as Keil points out, for grammatical reasons, if the whole sentence be considered, be taken in an instrumental sense—that is, that Israel would overcome their enemies with mere sling stones, as David did Goliath.

The true meaning is rather that given in the Revised Version, "they shall tread down sling stones"; and since in the next verse Israel is likened to the precious stones set in a crown, it is probably correct to suppose, with Hengstenberg, Keil, Hitzig, Pusey, etc., that "the sling stones" are, in comparison, to be taken "as a figure denoting the enemy, who is trampled under the feet like stones."

The idea is further carried out in figurative language when the victorious Israelites are described in the second half of the 15th verse as making a noise like men drunk with wine—the drink with which they are made drunk being the blood of the enemies of the Lord. "With this blood the prophet describes the victorious Jews as being filled, like the sacrificial bowls in which the priests were wont to catch the blood of the victims which were slain; and they would be sprinkled with it like the corners of the altar, which expression includes the horns of the altar, which were wont to be sprinkled with the sacrificial blood."

The climax is reached in the last two verses. The final overthrow and subjugation of world power is followed by the exaltation and the glorification of the people of God. "And Jehovah their God shall save them in that day as the flock of His people: for they shall be as the stones of a crown lifted on high."

The picture in the 16th verse changes from war and bloodshed to that of the Shepherd and His flock, which plays so prominent a part in the last chapters of this prophetic book.

Jehovah in that day shall "save them." This does not mean here merely that He will help and deliver them. This, as another writer points out, would affirm much too little after what has gone before. "When Israel has trodden down his foes, he no longer needs deliverance." The meaning is rather that God will in that day endow them with salvation, not only in the negative sense of deliverance, but in the positive sense; and, if we want to know what is implied in it, we have it in the figure of the next clause. He will do for them and be to them all that a shepherd does and is to his flock, which implies that He will not only seek, and deliver, and gather them, but He Himself, in the person of the Messiah, as all the prophets bear witness, will tend, and feed, and lead, and rule over them—all which is implied in the Hebrew word "Shepherd." That most beautiful "nightingale song," Ps. 23, which is so precious to us now, will then express the experience of saved Israel. "Jehovah is my Shepherd, I shall not want"—because in His Shepherd-care the fullest provision is made for every need, both spiritual and temporal, for His own flock.

Another aspect of this positive "Salvation" which Jehovah shall then bestow upon His people, is brought before us in the second half of this verse. In contrast to their enemies, who are likened to "sling stones," which shall then be contemptuously trodden under foot, saved Israel shall be abhnei-nezer "stones of a crown" (or jewels set in a consecrated crown), lifted on high over His land—which reminds us of Isa. 62, where we read that after "Zion's righteousness shall go forth as brightness, and her salvation as a lamp that burneth," so that "the nations shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory"—then "Thou shalt also be a crown of beauty in the hand of Jehovah, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God." We note the expression in this verse, "over His land," which reminds us of the unique relationship in which Jehovah stands to the land, as well as to the people of Israel. "The land is Mine," He said of Palestine in a very special sense, though the whole earth belongs to Him; and this, as Pusey observes, "was laid down as the title-deed to its whole tenure." He appointed it in His sovereign right, and with a gracious purpose in view, as the inheritance of the seed of Abraham; but the ownership remains vested in Him. It is called also "Immanuel's Land" because the theocratic King-Messiah is the true heir to it, not only by reason of His being the true Son of Abraham, and Son of David, to whom the land was promised, but because He is the Son of God, to Whom it, in a special sense, belongs.

For a long time Israel has been banished from their possession on account of sin, and Jerusalem and Palestine are being trodden down of the Gentiles; but the counsel of Jehovah, both as regards the land and the people, standeth for ever, the gifts and the calling of God are without repentance; and when the covenant relations between God and "His own" people Israel are restored, "Jehovah shall inherit Judah, His portion in the Holy Land, and shall choose Jerusalem again."

The prophet ends this section of the prophecy with the exclamation: "For how great is His goodness, and how great is His beauty!—Ki mah tubho umah yaphyo—corn shall make the young men to flourish and new wine the maids"

Let me, in closing the exposition of this chapter; echo this exclamation of the prophet, "How great is His goodness!" "Goodness is that attribute of God whereby He loveth to communicate to all who can or will receive it all good—yea, Himself, who is the fulness and universality of good. Creator of all good, not in one way, not in one kind of goodness only, but absolutely, without beginning, without limit, without measure, save that whereby without measurement He possesseth and embraceth all excellence, all perfection, all blessedness, all good."

"This good His goodness bestoweth on all and each, according to the capacity of each to receive it; nor is there any limit to His giving, save His creatures' capacity of receiving, which also is a good gift from Him. From Him all things sweet derive their sweetness, all things fair their beauty, all things bright their splendor, all things that live their life, all things sentient—their sense, all that move their vigor, all intelligences their knowledge, all things perfect their perfection, all things in any wise good their goodness."

"And how great is His beauty!" This we cannot fully know until we are fully transformed into His image and can gaze upon His unveiled glory. But even now we may pray with David: "One thing have I asked of the Lord, that will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in His temple" (Ps. 27:4). And the more we behold it even now by faith and with the veil of flesh between, and inquire about it, the more shall we be changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Lord the Spirit.

But, to come back to the context, this goodness and beauty of Jehovah shall in that future day also be reflected by restored and converted Israel, when "they shall be as precious stones of a crown lifted up high over His land."

And of the abundance of spiritual blessing and "glory" which shall then dwell in the land, material prosperity and temporal abundance will, as is not the case in the present dispensation, be the outward sign and accompaniment. "Corn" exclaims the prophet, "shall make the young men cheerful" (yenobhabh, literally, to "grow" or to "increase"), "and new wine the maids (or 'virgins')."

But the mention of young men and maidens is, as has been observed, merely intended to "heighten the picture of prosperity given by the prophet," and is in some respects a parallel to the prophetic description of the prosperity of the land and people in the earlier portion of the book, where the streets of Jerusalem are spoken of as being again "full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof."

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What prophecy concerning Christ is found in this chapter?

Ps. 72:8-11 Zech. 9:9-10 Matt. 21:4-5

Show how the goodness of God comes out here in connection with Israel and Christian believers as well.

Zechariah 10:1-12

The blessed and prosperous condition of restored and converted Israel under the care and leadership of their true Shepherd-King may be given as the summary of the chapter to which we have now come. The first verses are linked on, and are a continuation of the promises contained in the last section (vv. 7-11) of the 9th chapter.

Of the abundance of spiritual blessings and glory which shall then dwell in the land, to repeat a few sentences from my notes on ch. 9:19—"Material prosperity and temporal abundance will, as is not the case in the present dispensation, be the outward sign and accompaniment." "Corn," exclaims the prophet at the conclusion of that chapter, "shall make the young men cheerful (or, literally, 'grow' or 'increase'), and new wine the maids (or 'virgins')."

But for Palestine to become once again, yea, even more than before, a land "flowing with milk and honey," after its many centuries of barrenness and desolation, the fertilizing showers are essential; and though this is promised to them, they are yet exhorted to "ask" for it, even as in Ezek. 36, where, after promising, among many other great things, that "this land which was desolate shall become like the garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities shall become fenced and inhabited," we read: "Thus saith the Lord God, yet for this will I be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them"—for the promises of God, whether in relation to temporal or spiritual blessings, are only turned into experience by the faith and prayers of His people.

But it is perhaps necessary to repeat and emphasize that it is literal rain which is meant here, in the first instance, in which connection it is important to observe that Israel was taught to regard the giving or withholding of this great temporal blessing, upon which the prosperity of the land and the life of man and beast are dependent, as entirely in the hand of God. "Are there any among the vanities of the heathen that can cause rain?" exclaimed the prophet Jeremiah, "or can the heavens (of themselves) give showers? art not Thou He, O Jehovah our God? therefore we will wait upon Thee: for Thou hast made all these things."

In these modern times men have grown wiser, and no longer recognize or acknowledge God in what to them is entirely due to "natural causes"; but such wisdom is based on a science only falsely so called, and is foolishness in the eyes of those who know that there is a living, personal God, the Creator and Upholder of all things, who, though He in His infinite power and wisdom appointed certain "laws" to govern His creation, is Himself all the time behind and above these laws, to guide and control; and does, either by using "natural means" which are known to us, or apart from them, interfere in the affairs of men and nations with a view to deliver, or instruct, or correct. To Israel, rain in due season, so that the land should yield her increase, was promised as the direct reward of national obedience.

"And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto My commandments which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God, and to serve Him with all your heart and with all your soul, that I will give the rain of your land in its season, the former rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil."

And it is a notorious fact that the withholding of the showers and the scarcity of the rainfall—whatever the secondary causes by which it may be accounted for—was one of the chief factors in the predicted desolation of Palestine, during the many centuries that the people has been banished from it on account of apostasy.

But to return to our passage. It is especially "the latter rain" which in Palestine is so important as strengthening and maturing the crops, that they are here exhorted to ask of the Lord, so that He may graciously complete "what He had begun by the former rain, filling the ears before the harvest."

But though the primary reference is to literal showers, "on which the successful cultivation of the fruits of the ground depends," I agree with the German Bible scholar who says that the exhortation to ask for rain "only serves to individualize the prayer for the bestowal of the blessings of God, in order to sustain both temporal and spiritual life." Indeed, there is a blending of temporal and spiritual blessings in the promise in the 9th and 10th chapters, the outward and visible being the types (foreshadows) and symbols of the spiritual and eternal. When, on coming out of Egypt, Israel was brought into covenant relationship with God, we read, "Thou, O God, did send a plentiful rain; Thou did confirm Thine inheritance when it was weary."

And when Jehovah shall have mercy upon Zion again, and bring back His people after the long centuries of their "weary" wanderings, the light of His blessed countenance shall be as "life" to them, "and His favor as a cloud of the latter rain"—yea, in response to the spirit of grace and of supplication which shall then be created in them, God says, "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and streams (or 'floods') upon the dry ground; I will pour My Spirit upon thy seed, and My blessing upon thine offspring."

Viewed as a symbol of spiritual gifts and blessings, there is a message also for you and me in this ancient exhortation, dear reader. Indeed, I look upon this passage as one of the most beautiful scriptures in the Old Testament in reference to prayer, and God's manner of answering.

1. "Ask ye of Jehovah, . . . and Jehovah shall give" which reminds us of the word of our Lord Jesus: "Ask, and ye shall receive," for the God of Israel is a God who does answer prayer. Sometimes the answer may be brought about by apparently natural causes, but all the same it is "Jehovah that maketh lightnings," and commandeth the clouds to discharge their fertilizing showers.

2. "Ask ye of Jehovah Rain, . . . and He shall give them showers of rain, in'tar geshem"—literally, "rain of plenty, or pouring rain"; for our God is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, and this both in relation to temporal and spiritual things.

3. "And He will give to every one grass in the field" for He individualizes His gifts and blessings, and not one is left out of His gracious and bountiful provision and care.

But one great condition of effectual prayer is that our hearts and expectations be set wholly upon God. "Hear, O My people, and I will testify unto thee: O Israel, if thou would hearken unto Me; there shall no strange god be in thee; neither shalt thou worship any strange god. I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it."

It was Israel's divided heart, the turning away from the true and living God to follow after the vanities of the Gentiles, which was the cause of Israel's calamities and ruin in the past. This is what the prophet reminds them of in the 2nd verse: "For the idols ('teraphim') have spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie; they have told false dreams (or, 'and dreams speak vanity'), they comfort in vain: therefore they went their way (or 'wandered') like sheep, they are oppressed (or 'afflicted'), because there was no shepherd."

It is the teraphim, or "speaking" oracles of the heathen, and their consultants, or diviners, that the prophet specially speaks of in this verse.

"Apart from our passage there are only seven other scriptures in the Hebrew Bible where the teraphim are introduced; but these suffice to show that they were not only idols, the use of which is classed by God with 'witchcraft, stubbornness, and iniquity,' but that they were a peculiar kind of idols, namely, those used for oracular responses. The first mention of the teraphim is in connection with Jacob's flight from Laban, in Gen. 30; and in the light of the other passages there seems probability in the explanation of Aben Ezra that Rachel stole them in order that her father might not discover the direction of their flight by means of these oracles.

"The second place where we find them is in that strange narrative about the Ephraimite Micah, and the Danite expedition to Laish, in Judg. 17 and 18, where we get a sad and characteristic glimpse of the condition of some among the tribes in those days, 'when there was no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes.' This narrative supplies an illustration of the fact that not only is man incapable of himself to find God, but that, left to himself, he is incapable of retaining the knowledge of God in its original purity even when once divinely communicated; and that even the things revealed, apart from the continued teaching of God's Spirit, are liable to become corrupted and distorted in his mind. Here we have a sad instance of a certain knowledge of Jehovah mixed up with the worship of 'a graven image and a molten image,' which were an abomination in His sight, and the illegitimate use of the divinely instituted ephod, which was only to be borne by the high priest, joined together with the pagan teraphim. But the point to be noted is that here also these teraphim were used for oracular consultations, for it was of them that the apostate Levite of Bethlehem asked for counsel for the idolatrous Danites. In Ezek. 21:21 we find the exact antithesis to David's consulting the ephod, in the pagan king of Babylon 'consulting with images' (literally, 'teraphim'), in reference to his projected invasion of Palestine.

"Now it is clear that in olden times, whenever by apostasy and disobedience fellowship with Jehovah was interrupted, and when in consequence there was no revelation from Him, 'neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets,' Israel turned to the pagan teraphim, or, like poor Saul, they 'sought unto such as had familiar spirits and wizards that peep and mutter.'

"A parallelism, in its spiritual significance, is to be found in Christendom. What the ephod or the prophet was in olden times, Holy Scripture is now. It is even a 'more sure word' than voices from heaven, or answers by Urim and Thummim. The Scriptures, first spoken by holy men of God as they were moved by the Holy Spirit, are now 'the oracles of God' themselves speaking with voices which carry their own conviction to hearts honestly seeking for truth, and ever confirming themselves in the world's history and in the Christian's experience; but men in the present day, even in Christendom, stumbling at the supernatural, as if there could be a revelation of the Infinite and Everlasting One without such an element in them, turn away from these oracles often on the flimsiest grounds, and instead are giving heed on the one hand to the speculations of a 'science falsely so called,' and on the other hand 'to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils,' and are thus in a measure supplying an illustration of the solemn words of the apostle, that if men receive not the love of the truth that they might be saved, 'God shall for this cause send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie.'

"For of the modern Christian teraphim it is as true as of the ancient pagan ones, that 'they speak vanity,' or 'wickedness'; and as for their 'diviners,' or false prophets representing them, 'they see a lie, and tell false dreams, they comfort in vain'; for it is a comfort not well founded, and will not stand the test of death, or of a judgment to come."

But to return to our passage: "Therefore"—the prophet continues, because they followed lying oracles, and they who should have strengthened them in God, and in His truth, told them their own false dreams, and comforted them with vain expectations—"they went their way (or 'wandered') like sheep, they are afflicted (or 'oppressed'), because there is no shepherd."

The primary reference is very probably to their wandering and oppression in the Babylonian Captivity, but the picture is true also of the much longer exile and greater affliction which commenced with the destruction of the second Temple.

This is how our Lord Jesus beheld Israel's multitudes, and "was moved with compassion on them, because they were distressed (or 'plagued,' or 'harassed') and scattered," i.e., they were troubled, neglected, uncared for.

Their outward condition, as they followed Him about from place to place, a disorganized mass, hungry and weary was pitiable enough, but this was but a faint picture of their spiritual condition, of the wretchedness of their souls, in consequence of the misguidance and tyranny of their false leaders.

And there in Matt. 9, even as in this passage in Zechariah, which may have been in our Lord's mind at the time, the saddest touch in the gloomy picture of Israel's distressed and helpless condition is contained in the words, "because there is no shepherd" or, "as sheep having no shepherd" i.e., no one to guide, or control, or care for them. There were indeed in the time before the Captivity, as later in our Lord's time, many who called themselves "shepherds," but they were false, deceiving shepherds, who devoured the flock, and sought only to feed themselves.

But to proceed to the 3rd verse.

Because their appointed shepherds have proved false, Jehovah Himself, in the Person of the Messiah (as we shall see from the 4th verse), is going to act the part of the Good Shepherd to them. And first He will show His care for His people by delivering them from their false shepherds. "Mine anger is kindled against the shepherds, and I will punish the he-goats." It is not necessary to suppose, with Hengstenberg, Keil, Koehler, etc., that by these false shepherds and he-goats, the "heathen governors and tyrants" who ruled over them in captivity, are meant. It is much more likely that the prophet has such scriptures from the "former prophets," as Jer. 23 and Ezek. 34, in his mind, where the false shepherds are their own faithless princes, priests, and prophets—in short, those in their own nation who should have led them, but only misled them; and of whom, alas! there has been no lack at any time or period in Jewish history.

Atudim—"he-goats," though it does sometimes (as in Isa. 14:9) signify rulers or princes, must not here be confounded with "the shepherds," but must be viewed in the light of Ezek. 34, where, after judgments are announced against the false shepherds (or rulers), we read, "And as for you, O My flock, thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I judge between cattle and cattle, as well (as between) the rams and the he-goats (atudim)"—where the latter stand for the rich and strong ones among the people themselves who oppressed the humble and the poor.

And not only will He deliver them from the false shepherds, the best part of the promise is contained in the second half of the verse, "For Jehovah of hosts hath visited (or 'visits') His flock, the house of Judah, and makes them as His goodly horse in the war (or 'battle')." The perfect tense of paqad, "to visit," is used here also prophetically of what God has resolved to do and will assuredly carry out. And when He visits His flock for good, and assumes His shepherd-care of them, they will be no more like distressed and scattered sheep, a prey to any wild beast, but they shall be strong in Jehovah and in the power of His might. He shall make them (or "set them") "as His goodly horse," or, as the phrase may be rendered, "the horse of His Majesty"—that is, the horse fit and equipped for the God of Majesty to ride forth upon "in battle," to execute His judgments upon the nations.

We now come to the 4th verse of the 10th chapter, which I regard as one of the richest Messianic prophecies in the Old Testament. In keeping with Zechariah's style, which I have so often had occasion to point out in my notes on the earlier chapters, we have in this short verse not only allusions, but a terse summary of a number of utterances by the "former prophets" in reference to the character and mission of Israel's promised Redeemer.

"From him the corner (or 'corner-stone'), from him the nail (or 'peg'), from him the battle bow, yea, from him shall proceed every ruler together (or, 'he that will exercise all rule')."

"From him," must be understood of Judah—the sense being equivalent to "out of himself" with a probable allusion to Deut. 18:15-19, where the promised great prophet like unto Moses, but who should yet be greater than Moses, is spoken of as coming forth "from the midst of thee, of thy brethren"; and Jer. 30:25, where we read: "And their Prince (literally, their 'glorious one') shall be of themselves, and their ruler shall proceed from the midst of them". It is partly in explanation how, and through whom, the promise in the 3rd verse shall be fulfilled, namely, that when Jehovah visits "the house of Judah" they shall suddenly be transformed from a flock of scattered, troubled sheep, into His stately irresistible war-horse.

It is also in harmony with the whole testimony of prophetic scripture that the family of David, of the tribe of Judah, should be the human stock, and Bethlehem Ephratha in the portion of Judah, the place on earth where He should come forth "that is, to be Ruler in Israel" though we are at the same time reminded that, according to His Divine nature, "His goings forth are from of old from the days of eternity," as the passage in Mic. 5:2 reads literally.

1. The Corner-stone

Out of Judah then shall come forth "the corner" (phinnah, the corner-stone). The allusion is doubtless to Isa. 28:16, where, contrasting the sure refuge which He Himself provides for His people with the refuges of lies which men make for themselves, which shall be swept away by the hailstorms of His judgments, the Lord says, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation ('a foundation well founded'); he that believeth shall not make haste"—a scripture which has always been regarded as Messianic by both Jews and Christians. The Christian cannot also forget the fact that in the New Testament the figure of the foundation stone, and head-stone of the corner, is applied to our Lord Jesus both by Himself and by the apostles. But the question is, What is implied in it? Writing as I do here, primarily for Christians, and in the full light which the New Testament revelation casts upon the ancient prophecies in the Old Testament, I would say that the first and most obvious truth which the Spirit of God would have us learn from this figure is that the Messiah is the sure foundation of "the House of God, which is the Church of the living God." For the safety and stability of a building almost everything depends on the foundation. The plan and material may be ever so perfect; the ornamentation ever so elaborate and beautiful—but all is of no avail if the foundation be sand, for it cannot abide the storm or flood. On the other hand, the materials of a building may be of more humble quality, the ornamentation may be less elaborate or plain; but if the foundation be sound, the rain may descend, the floods come, and the winds blow and beat upon that house, it will not fall, for it is built upon a rock. Now the great God, the Divine Architect of the universe, has purposed within Himself from all eternity to raise out of frail, imperfect, human materials a glorious Temple for His own eternal habitation through the Spirit, which, when completed, shall show forth, even more than the material temple of the universe, to principalities and powers the infinite power and manifold wisdom of God; and in order to ensure its eternal safety He has bestowed great care on the foundation. He Himself has laid it: "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation," for it is a task which could not be entrusted to, or accomplished by, men or angels.

And the "tried" and "precious" corner-stone which He laid as the basis of this mystical structure is His own Son, who is "perfected for evermore," against whom even the gates of hell shall not prevail.

This accounts for the continuance and immovableness of the Church of Christ, in spite of the many storms it has had to brave, and the insidious attacks from enemies and false friends. Let the storm rage; let infidelity assail; let men and devils do their utmost. Has it not been foretold in advance that the same precious foundation stone upon which millions would build unto their eternal safety, would also become a stone of stumbling and rock of offence against which many would stumble, and fall, and be broken to pieces?

But "the foundation of God remains sure," and those whose feet are firmly planted on it have no occasion to fear. Therefore the prophet adds: "He that believeth shall not make haste"—that is, to flee in alarm at the threatened judgments, in the day when God ariseth to shake terribly this earth, but shall abide safe on the unshakeable Rock of Ages and Eternal Refuge.

But, secondly, the corner-stone served not only as a foundation, but, to quote a dictionary definition, it is "that stone which unites the two walls at the corner." It is a point of much interest that the original foundation stone of Solomon's Temple was actually discovered as one of the early results of the exploration carried on by the Palestine Exploration Fund. I take the following from a small work by one of its agents, which gives the account of this discovery:

"Among the ancient Jews the foundation corner-stone of their sanctuary on Moriah was regarded as the emblem of moral and spiritual truths. It had two functions to perform: first, like the other foundation stones it was a support for the masonry above; but it had also to face both ways, and was thus a bond of union between two walls. . . .

"The engineers, in order to ascertain the dimensions of this foundation stone, worked round it, and report that it is three feet eight inches high and fourteen feet in length. At the angle it is let down into the rock to a depth of fourteen inches; but, as the rock rises towards the north, the depth of four feet north of the angle is increased by thirty-two inches, while the northern end seems entirely embedded in the rock. The block is further described as squared and polished, with a finely dressed face.

"It does not appear to have any marginal draft at the bottom, and indeed this was not necessary, as the lower part, being sunk in the rock, would always be hidden from view; but the absence of the lower draft indicates that the block was dressed in the quarry in a somewhat peculiar style, with a view to its being the foundation corner-stone. The draft on the upper margin of the stone is four inches wide. Fixed in its abiding position 3000 years ago, it still stands sure and steadfast, a fitting emblem of the 'Rock of Ages,' that cannot be removed, but abideth fast for ever."

And in this respect also the corner-stone is a fit emblem of our Lord Jesus Christ. "For He is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle-wall of partition between us; having abolished in His flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in Himself of twain one new man, so making peace." In spite of mutual prejudice and the otherwise impassable legal and ceremonial gulf that separated the Jew from the Gentile, Christ is the angle at which they both meet to be united as one building, or, even more closely, as the members of one body. This indeed is the connection in which Paul speaks of Christ under this figure in that great scripture from which I have already quoted.

After reminding the Ephesian believers how that formerly they were "Gentiles in the flesh, called uncircumcision by that which is called circumcision in the flesh made by hands, . . . without Christ, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world," he proceeds to say:

"But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ, . . . Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord, in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit."

I must not tarry here to point out the difference between the "corner-stone" and the "head-stone of the corner," to which there are also many allusions in the Hebrew Scriptures, and of the important truths which are set forth under the figures in reference to Israel's past and future attitude to their Messiah, having elsewhere fully entered into these subjects."

I proceed therefore to the second designation of the Messiah in this passage.

2. The Nail in the Sure Place

The word yathed, translated here "nail", is used first of a tent-pin, or stake, which is driven into the ground and to which the tent is fastened; and, secondly, of the strong peg inside the Oriental tent, or which is built into the wall of the Eastern building, on which is hung most of its valuable furniture.

The primary allusion is to Isa. 22, where we read: "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder, and he shall open and none shall shut; and he shall shut and none shall open. And I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place; and he shall be for a throne of glory to his father's house. And they shall hang upon him all the glory of his father's house, the offspring and the issue, every small vessel, from the vessel of cups even to all the vessels of flagons."

Now this prophecy in Isaiah, though uttered primarily of a son of David—namely, Eliakim—merges into the Son of David, the Messiah, in whom all the promises given to the Davidic house finally center and are being fulfilled. It is He who is "the glorious throne to His Father's house," the true heir and perpetuator of the throne of His father David, and of His Kingdom, "to establish it, and to uphold it with judgment and with righteousness from henceforth, even forever," and who, as we have seen in the exposition of ch. 6, "shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon His throne." Anyhow, to us it is not without significance that the risen Christ in His message through His servant John to the Church in Philadelphia, in allusion to the words addressed to Eliakim, claims to be the one who is in possession of the key of the house of David—"These things, saith He that is holy, He that is true. He that hath the key of David, He that openeth and none shall shut, and that shutteth and none openeth."

The reference in Isa. 22, and in our passage in Zechariah which is based upon it, is not to the "nail," or pin, or stake, to which the ropes of the tent are fastened, but to the strong peg inside the tent, or built into the wall of the house.

(a) The "nail," or peg, when thus fastened in a sure place, was used to hang burdens upon. This we see from Isa. 22:25, where, speaking of the overthrow of the unfaithful Shebna, the treasurer of the king's house, who thought himself quite safe in his position, as a nail in a sure place, the Lord says, "And the burden upon it" (hammassa—"the heavy weight," used here figuratively of the weight of office and responsibility as governor of the king's house) "shall be cut off."

In the light of this fact we easily perceive the applicability and preciousness of this figure as applied to the Messiah. He is not only the Foundation of the mystical temple, and the uniting "Corner-stone" in whom all believers, either Jew or Gentile, are made one, but to those inside the spiritual house He is the Nail in a sure place, upon whom they may hang their "burdens." Ah, how many there be among God's people who know Christ as the Foundation of their hopes for eternity, but little as their Burden-bearer, "who bears their grief and carries their sorrows"! Cast thy burden upon the Lord, O Christian, whatever it may be, "and He will sustain thee."

(b) But, secondly, the chief purpose of the nail, or peg fastened in a sure place, is, that upon it may hang all the glory of the house, "all vessels of small quantity, from the vessels of cups (or 'goblets') even to all the vessels of flagons." A great portion of the wealth of the ancient Orientals (and the same is still true in measure) consisted in gold and silver vessels and in changes of raiment. These, as well as shields, swords, and suits of armor taken in battle, they were wont, with Eastern ostentation, to hang on the "pegs" in their tents or houses for the admiration of all who entered.

And this, to pass from the figure to the great truth it is meant to represent, is what God expects us to do with Christ. When it is said, "They shall hang upon Him all the glory of His Father's house," it means that Israel shall yet render to Him that honor and glory, that joyful allegiance and willing consecration of themselves and their possessions, to which He is entitled as the true heir of the Davidic "house," and Lord of the theocratic kingdom. And it is our privilege also even now, during the period of His rejection, to "hang upon Him," that is, consecrate to Him and His service all that which we may regard as "our glory." Nor is there any one, even the least and the weakest of His redeemed people, who can say that he has nothing which he can dedicate to Him, for that which is most precious in His sight is a loving, confiding heart and an adoring spirit. But next to, and together with, the offering of ourselves, we are to "hang upon Him" whatever possessions or gifts or talents which He may have entrusted to us. And it is precious and beautiful to note that there is a place on the peg for "the cup or goblet" as well as for the "flagon": and "the vessel of small quantity," when fully consecrated to the Master's use, is of greater use, and brings more "glory" to Him, than the "vessel of large quantity" when not so fully surrendered. And as with our persons, so with our gifts. The "small offerings" from those who have but little, and to whom the giving implies real sacrifice for His blessed Name's sake, are at least equally if not more precious in His sight than the "large offerings" from those who have much. Above all, it is the motive which Jehovah, "by whom actions are weighed" (not counted or measured), takes into account.

3. The Battle Bow

It is generally agreed that every one of the four terms used in this verse (phinnah, "corner"; yathed, "nail"; qesheth milchamah, "battle bow"; and noges, "ruler" or "exactor") are all used metaphorically, and denote persons, or, as I verily believe, one Person, who Himself fulfils these different functions. The last two terms bring before us an aspect of the Messiah's character which will be manifest at His Second Coming. Then He will be the "Battle bow"—the mighty and skilful Archer, who shall send forth His "sharp arrows" in the heart of the king's enemies, "whereby the people shall be made to fall under Him." (Ps. 45:5)

This is an aspect of Christ's character on which men do not like to dwell; but let it not be forgotten that the same prophet, Isaiah, who pictures Him in the 53rd chapter as the suffering Lamb of God, who "as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, openeth not His mouth," describes Him in the 63rd chapter as clothed in majesty, marching forth in the greatness of His strength to take vengeance on the nations: "Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the winefat I have trodden the winepress alone, and of the peoples there was no man with Me: yea, I trod them in Mine anger, and trampled them in My fury; and their lifeblood is sprinkled upon My garments, and I have stained all My raiment" (Isa. 62:3-4)—an Old Testament vision which will be fulfilled at "the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of His power, in flaming fire, rendering vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus, . . . when He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be marvelled at in all them that believe." (1 Thess. 1:7-10)

"And I saw the heaven opened; and behold, a white horse, and He that sat thereon, called Faithful and True; and in righteousness He doth judge and make war. And His eyes are a flame of fire, and upon His head are many diadems; and

He hath a name written, which no one knoweth but He Himself. And He is arrayed in a garment sprinkled with blood: and His name is called The Word of God. And the armies which are in heaven followed Him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and pure. And out of His mouth proceedeth a sharp sword, that with it He should smite the nations: and He shall rule them with a rod of iron: and He treadeth the winepress of the fierceness of the wrath of Almighty God. And He hath on His garment and on His thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS." (Rev.19:11-16)

4. The Autocratic Ruler, or "Exactor"

It is not possible to speak with absolute certainty of the exact meaning of the last clause in the verse which we are considering, as the construction of the sentence in the original is unusual and peculiar, and has led to conflicting translations and interpretations. In rendering the words khol noges yachdav—"every ruler together," or, "he that will exercise all rule,"—I am guided more by the context and obvious sense than by strict principles of Hebrew grammar. It seems to me that, as the first terms in this verse undoubtedly refer to the Messiah in allusion to utterances about His person and mission by the "former prophets," so must this last clause also. Certain it is that the Messiah at His Second Coming shall gather up in Himself all authority and rule. He shall be then not only the Nasi—the chosen Prince from among the people; not only the Moshel, God's Viceroy or Deputy Ruler on the earth; not only a constitutional King, who reigns but does not rule—but He shall be the Noges, the absolute Ruler, or "Exactor"—the most absolute and autocratic King the world has yet seen.

In Messiah's reign on the earth God's sovereignty will be fully manifested, but it is blessed to remember that it will be sovereignty exercised by One who is not only "glorious in holiness," infinite in wisdom and power, but by Him who is also infinite in compassion, and whose very nature is love. His absolute autocratic rule, therefore, though a terror to the ungodly, is a thought full of comfort to the righteous, for it will mean righteousness, peace and joy to this long-afflicted earth, and the very consummation of blessedness to His own people. But there is truth in the suggestion that the title noges (absolute ruler or "exactor") is applied here to Israel's ideal king or absolute ruler in His relation, not to His own people, but to their and His enemies, from whom He will "exact submission and allegiance with a rod of iron," and who will make downtrodden Israel to rule over those who have long oppressed and ruled over them.

*"Now therefore be wise, O ye kings:
Be instructed, ye judges of the earth.
Serve Jehovah with fear,
And rejoice with trembling.
Kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish in the way,
When His wrath is kindled but a little.
Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him"*

Psalm 2:10-12

In the 5th verse the line of thought unfolded in the first three verses of this chapter is resumed, and the change which will come over the people after Jehovah of hosts, in the person of the Messiah, shall "visit His flock, the house of Judah" (v. 3), is now fully described.

Instead of being like a troubled and helpless flock of sheep (v. 2), they shall suddenly be transformed into His "goodly horse" (or "the horse of His Majesty") in battle, and instead of being "afflicted" and at the mercy of their adversaries, they shall be as "mighty men" treading upon their enemies. The "mire of the streets" is used here as a figure of their enemies, and is parallel to ch. 9:15, where it is said, "they shall trample on the sling stones" (which is the figure of contempt used there to describe their adversaries), while they themselves are likened to the abhnei nezer, "stones of a crown" (or jewels set in a consecrated crown), lifted on high over the land. The figure is found elsewhere in the prophetic Scriptures. Thus Micah says, "Mine eyes shall behold her ('mine enemy'); now shall she be trodden down (or, a 'treading down'), as the mire of the street"; but Zechariah, by a yet bolder image, "pictures those trampled upon as what they had become—the mire of the streets—as worthless, as foul." But not in their own strength shall they prevail, they shall be and "fight" as heroes, "because Jehovah is with them" the source and secret of their strength—therefore, "the riders upon horses"—the enemies' cavalry, the most formidable arm of the hostile forces—shall be put to shame, or confounded.

Yes, Israel in that day shall experience the truth of the words of their sweet Psalmist:

*"Some trust in chariots and some in horses;
But we will make mention of the Name of Jehovah our God;
They are bowed down and fallen;
But we are risen up and stand upright"*

Psalm 20:7-8

And the great deliverance which Jehovah shall then accomplish for Israel will embrace the entire nation, which in Zechariah's prophecies are regarded as no longer divided into two separate kingdoms, but as one people, with a common and inseparable destiny. "And I will strengthen the house of Judah; and I will save the house of Joseph; and I will bring them again, and make them dwell (or 'settle them'); for I have mercy upon them, and they shall be as though I had not cast them off; for I am Jehovah their God, and I will hear them."

In keeping with Zechariah's very terse style, and the summaries which we find sometimes in single words and expressions, both in the first and second parts of his book, of utterances by the "former prophets," we have here embodied in the words, "I will bring them again to place them", the promise uttered fully by Jeremiah, namely: "I will bring them again into this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely," for the most satisfactory grammatical explanation of the Hebrew word is that it is a blending of two verbs which have the respective meanings of "I will make them dwell," and "I will bring them back"—both ideas, as already the Jewish commentator Kimchi points out being expressed in the one word, namely, "He will cause them to return to their own land, and will cause them to dwell there in peace and security."

And He will do all this—strengthen, save, restore, and establish them, because "He shall have mercy upon them" for "The goodness and loving-kindness of God, and not any merit of theirs, is the first and principal cause" of Israel's whole salvation and grace, and the words of the inspired Psalmist: "They got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them";

But—

"Thy right hand, and Thine arm, and the light of Thy countenance, Because Thou hadst a favor unto them"— will be true of the future restoration, as it was true of their original possession of the land!
Psalm 44:3

And His mercy and loving-kindness will blot out all the past of sin and sorrow. "And they shall be" He says, "as though I had not cast them off" (or, literally, "as though I had not loathed them," the word being expressive of God's strong abhorrence of sin, and of sinners when they become wedded to it)—which reminds us of the greater promise of the new covenant: "I will forgive their iniquity and their sin will I remember no more"; and of the promise in Ezekiel: "And I will settle you as in your old estates, and I will do better unto you than at your beginnings"

The 5th verse ends with a beautiful glimpse of the restored relationship between Jehovah and His long-wandering people:

"For I am Jehovah"—that is, the everlasting, unchangeable, covenant-keeping God—which is the reason why the sinful sons of Jacob have not been consumed. And He is now "their God" for the Lo-ruhamah and Lo-ammi period of Israel's history shall then be ended, and no longer shall He say: "Ye are not My people, and I will not be your God." No; then He "will hear them"—or, as we read more fully in the 13th chapter, "They shall call on My name, and I will hear them; and I will say it is My people; and they shall say Jehovah is my God," which reminds us of many similar, if more general, promises in the prophetic Scriptures, as, for instance: "Then shalt thou call, and Jehovah shall answer; thou shalt cry, and He shall say, Here I am"; and again: "I, Jehovah, will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them."

And the joy and blessing and victory here promised is henceforth to be shared alike by the whole nation, which the prophet, in keeping with the peculiarity of his style, designates by the separate names, "House of Judah," and "House of Joseph," or "Ephraim," which together include the whole people which had, indeed, previous to the Exile, been for a long time divided into two frequently hostile kingdoms, but are from the time of the partial restoration from Babylon regarded as one nation, with one common hope and destiny.

"And they of Ephraim shall be like a mighty man, and their hearts shall rejoice as through wine; yea, their children shall see it and rejoice; their hearts shall rejoice (or 'be glad') in the Lord"—which is in effect a repetition more particularly in reference to "Ephraim" of what is stated in chs. 9:15 and 10:5 of Judah. And the reason why "Ephraim," or those previously belonging to the northern kingdom, are specially mentioned as included in the word of promise, is probably to be found (as suggested by Calvin and Hengstenberg) "in the circumstances of the times," or in the historic foreground of this prophecy. If the predictions of the earlier prophets in reference to Judah were now (that is, in Zechariah's time) only beginning to be fulfilled, and therefore needed to be renewed lest the nation should think itself deceived, much more was this the case with regard to Ephraim.

The great body of the people belonging to the northern kingdom was still in exile, though a small fraction of them had joined the children of Judah on their return, and there was outwardly but little in existing circumstances to support the hope of that grand restoration, which, according to the declaration of the former prophets, was one day to occur.

They of the "house of Joseph," as being in an apparently even more hopeless condition, are therefore especially assured that under the true son of David, the Redeemer-King, whose advent to "Zion" and "Jerusalem" the prophet had jubilantly announced in the 9th chapter, and who, in the 4th verse of the 10th chapter is spoken of as coming forth out of Judah, would fully share in all the blessings promised to the "house of Judah." They too would be brought back and made strong in the Lord and in the power of His might for the final conflict with their adversaries, so that they "shall be like a mighty man" or hero (that is, in "treading down their enemies in the mire of the streets," v. 5), "and their hearts shall rejoice as through wine"—which exhilarates and "maketh glad the heart of man" with a gladness which is not natural, and is a fit emblem, therefore, of the strength and exhilaration which are imparted by the Spirit of God.

And it will not be an evanescent (fleeting) joy which will soon fade away. No; "their children (also) shall see it," that is, the great things which God shall then do unto them—and be glad. "Their heart shall rejoice in Jehovah"—as the highest and only lasting source of joy "to whom," as an old writer puts it, "is to be referred all gladness which is derived from created things—that whoso glorieth may glory in the Lord, in whom alone the rational creature ought to take delight."

Most commentators suppose that v. 8 to the end of the chapter still speak of Ephraim; but the supposition is, I think, without sufficient warrant. Having spoken of the "house of Judah" and the "house of Joseph" separately, the prophet now proceeds to set forth the purpose of God in reference to both parts of the nation who constitute one people with one common destiny:

"I will kiss (whistle, nkjv) for them, and gather them; for I have redeemed them." (Zech. 10:8)

This verb sharaq, to "hiss," or "whistle," or "pipe," is used several times in the earlier scriptures to describe God's signal in calling together nations and peoples to accomplish His purposes. Thus, in Isaiah He uses this word when He threatens to gather the Gentile nations to chastise His people: "It shall come to pass in that day, that Jehovah shall hiss (or 'whistle') for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria. And they shall come and rest all of them in the desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks, and upon all thorns, and upon all bushes" And again: "He will lift up an ensign to the nations from far, and will hiss (or 'whistle') unto them from the end of the earth. And behold they shall come with speed swiftly; none shall be weary or stumble among them." (Isa. 5:26-27, 7:18-19) That is, He would gather the hostile nations against them "like the countless numbers of the insect creation, which, if united, would irresistibly desolate life. He would summon them as the bee-owner by his shrill call summons and unites his own swarm." But now the time to favor Zion having come, this same word is used in our passage in Zech. 10 for the signal which He will use for the gathering together of His own dispersed people from the four corners of the earth.

The word sharaq, however, describes not only the shrill noise used to call together a swarm of insects—it means also, as already suggested above, to "pipe," and is used of the shepherd signal for the gathering of his scattered flock.

This, indeed, is the picture presented to our minds in this chapter. At present, because they have given heed to false dreamers, "they go on their way (or wander about) like sheep; they are troubled (or 'afflicted') because there is no shepherd" (v. 2); but when Jehovah of hosts, in the person of the Messiah, again "visits His flock," namely, "the house of Judah" (v. 3) and "the house of Joseph" (v. 6), He "will pipe for them and gather them."

If I may digress for a moment, and mention incidents of personal experience, I would say that on more than one occasion I have had the figure referred to in this passage illustrated before my eyes. On one occasion (it was in 1891) while camping for a few days with missionary friends in a wild part high up on the Lebanon, a picturesque-looking young Bedouin shepherd was leading a small flock of sheep to some distant part in search of pasturage. Passing our encampment he stopped for a while to converse with us, and in the meantime his flock got scattered among the rocks; but by and by, when he was ready to start, he pulled out from under his burnoose a reed pipe, and began to play on it a not very melodious tune; and it was interesting and beautiful to notice how, as he was playing, his scattered sheep, some of which had wandered off to some distance, collected closer and closer around him, and formed into a flock; and when they were all there he started off again at their head. Involuntarily this passage from Zechariah came to my mind: "I will pipe for them and gather them." On another occasion, when travelling in 1889 one whole night in a diligence in inland Algeria, we stopped about dawn at an inn in a small Arab village to change horses. While this was being done, an Arab who stood near began to play, or whistle, on one of the same kind of rough reed or bamboo pipe. At first I thought he was playing for our benefit in order to get baksheesh, but I soon observed that as he continued "piping," sheep and cows and goats came toward him from all directions. It was the village shepherd gathering his flock to lead them forth to pasture.

Thus also the Shepherd of Israel is going to gather His flock and lead them into their own pastures. "If any of thine outcasts be in the uttermost parts of heaven" He says, "thence will Jehovah thy God gather thee, and from thence will He fetch thee; and Jehovah thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and He will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers."

And He will do this, He says, because "I have redeemed them"—with a full and complete redemption, not only from outward captivity, but "from all their iniquities," so that they shall be known and called in that day "The holy people, the redeemed of Jehovah"—henceforth to serve and glorify Him, "Who hath ransomed them from the hand of him that was stronger than he."

And when thus redeemed and gathered in their own land again, "they shall increase as they have increased"—which latter phrase, as already Kimchi in his commentary explains, is meant to remind us of God's wonderful and gracious dealings with them during the last days of their sojourn in Egypt, where "the children of Israel were fruitful" because of the blessings of Jehovah upon them, "and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them." And thus, again after the future greater redemption, the spared remnant, who shall have been brought through the fiery purging ordeal described in the last chapters of this very prophecy, shall increase mightily, even "as they have increased" (that is, in Egypt), and become a mighty nation on the earth.

And this increase will characterize the seed of Israel in a striking degree, even while still scattered among the nations. This I believe to be the meaning of the words which follow in the 9th verse: "And I will sow-them among the peoples; and they shall remember Me in far countries: and they shall live with their children, and shall return." The controversy among commentators as to whether the expression, "I will sow them among the peoples," is to be understood as a prediction of a scattering of the people among the nations subsequent to the partial restoration from Babylon, is, according to my judgment, settled by the fact that the verb (sara') which is employed, is never used of scattering, or dispersing, in a bad sense, but always "to sow"; and the prediction in this verse cannot therefore refer to a dispersion of the Jewish people to be inflicted as a punishment. It is most probable that this passage in Zechariah is based on two utterances of the former "prophets." The first is Hos. 2:23, where we read; "And I will sow her unto Me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not My people, Thou art My people; and they shall say, Thou art my God." And the second is Jer. 31:27: "Behold, the days come, saith Jehovah, that I will sow the house of Israel and the house of Judah with the seed of man, and with the seed of beasts."

It is not necessary then to understand the words in Zechariah as referring to a future act of dispersion (though, as a matter of history, a dispersion subsequent to the partial restoration from Babylon—or rather, a new and more terrible and universal phase of the dispersion which was inaugurated by the Babylonian Captivity, did take place after Israel's national apostasy from God was completed in the rejection and crucifixion of their Messiah), but rather as a prediction first of all that in the dispersion which had already begun with the destruction of the city and Temple by the Babylonians, and which would last till the full and final restoration of the whole nation (Judah and Israel) to their own land, which is still in the future—God would cause them to multiply. This increase (to judge from the analogy of their experience in Egypt, to which allusion is made more than once in this chapter) would take place toward the end of the time of their sojourning among the nations, and would be a precursor of their national restoration.

And not only would they be preserved even in dispersion, and increase and multiply even as they did during the last days of their sojourn in Egypt, but in those "far countries" where they shall be found "they shall remember Me" saith Jehovah—which is perhaps an inspired echo by Zechariah of the words of Ezekiel: "And they that escape of you shall remember Me among the nations whither they shall be carried captive, and they shall loathe themselves for the evil which they have committed in all their abominations. And they shall know that I am the Lord."

The next sentence in the 9th verse, "They shall live with their children, and turn again" must be connected with the words which immediately precede. Because they shall remember Jehovah "in the far countries" they shall live. Here we probably have an allusion (as Hengstenberg suggests) in one word (in the Hebrew) "to the figure which Ezekiel has so beautifully carried out in ch. 37." They who, while dispersed among the nations, are seen by the prophet as dry bones scattered over the valley of vision, are to live again, for: "Behold, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, O My people; . . . and I will put My Spirit in you, and ye shall live, . . . and ye shall know that I am Jehovah." Neither shall this new national and spiritual life be transient in its character. No; not only shall they live, but "their children" also, the thought expressed in these words being the same as "their children also shall see it," in the 9th verse. "And shall return" (or "turn again")—not only to their land but to their God, the word being the same which the prophets constantly used when calling to Israel to repent—as, for instance: "Turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways: for why will ye die, O house of Israel?"

In the 10th verse the gathering and leading back by the Shepherd of Israel of His scattered flock are more minutely described:

"I will bring them back out of the land of Egypt, and from Assyria will I gather them"; which two Powers, to quote another writer, may perhaps be regarded as "standing here as of old, for the two conflicting empires (Egypt to the south and Assyria to the north) between which Israel lay, at whose hand she had suffered, and who represent the countries which lay beyond." But there is no need to allegorize the names of Egypt and Assyria, as almost all the commentators do, as used only typically of the lands of Israel's oppression. I believe it to be a prophecy which merges into the most distant future (from the prophet's then point of view), and will be literally fulfilled at the final restoration, "when Jehovah shall lift up His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people, . . . and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from Assyria and from Egypt, . . . and from the four corners of the earth."

It is a fact that there are now many Jews scattered in the regions which formed the "Assyrian" or Babylon empire as well as in Egypt, and with the revival and progress of the East their numbers in those countries will greatly increase.

And when Jehovah thus gathers them and leads them back, He will bring them "into the land of Gilead and Lebanon" which probably represent the whole promised land east and west of the Jordan. But even there "place will not be found for them," which reminds us of Isa. 49:20, 21, where we read: "The children of thy bereavement shall yet say in thine ears, The place is too strait for me: give place to me that I may dwell. Then shalt thou say in thine heart, Who hath begotten me these, seeing I have been bereaved of my children, and am solitary, an exile, and wandering to and fro? Who hath brought up these? Behold, I was left alone; these, where were they?"—which again reminds us of the jubilant exclamation in Isa. 54:

"Sing-[exult], O barren, thou that didst not bear;
Break forth into singing, and cry, thou that didst not travail:
For more are the children of the desolate
Than of the married wife, saith Jehovah?"

The words are addressed to Jerusalem, the counterpart of Sarah, in her barrenness at first and her fruitfulness afterwards. She is barren now—not, indeed, because she had never borne children, but because in her captivity and exile she had been robbed of her children, and as a holy city had all this time given birth to none. But she is to awake and sing, because the children that shall gather around her after her long period of desolateness would be more than when in the time before her calamity came upon her she had as a married wife—yea, so great will be the increase of Zion's future population, that, instead of bewailing her lonely and desolate condition, she shall even hear her children say "in her own ears" that the place is too strait, and the call to the surrounding nations: "Give place (literally, 'give way,' or 'fall back'), that I may be able to settle down."

I have elsewhere pointed out that the land which God by oath and covenant promised to the fathers is about fifty times as large as the part which hitherto the Jews actually possessed, and that it is only pitiable ignorance which made the superficial Voltaire utter the blasphemy that the God of the Jews must have been a little God, because He gave His people a land no larger than Wales, and called it "a good land and a large" (Ex. 3:8). Surely a land which includes within its boundaries an area at least one-third more than the whole of France may with right be called "a large land"; but it is possible that even the larger land, with its desert parts transformed into fruitful fields, will not suffice to hold the whole of blessed Israel in the millennial period, so great and rapid will be the increase of the saved remnant.

In the 11th verse God's wonderful works on behalf of His people in the past are again alluded to as the basis and illustration of what He will do for them in the yet greater deliverance of the future. When He brought them out of Egypt, He went before them in the pillar of cloud; and when pursued by Pharaoh and his host, and there seemed no way of escape, He made a way in the sea, and a path in the deep waters for His redeemed to pass over. Now, "as in the days of thy coming forth out of the land of Egypt," He says, "will I show him marvellous things." Once again He Himself will march at their head, and no obstacle shall be allowed to hinder the progress of His redeemed people on their way back to Zion. Should any hindrance present itself, even if it be as formidable as the Red Sea at the exodus from Egypt, "He shall pass through the sea of affliction (or straitness), and shall smite the waves in the sea, and all the depths of the river (or Nile) shall dry up (even as the Jordan did before the Ark of the Covenant): and the pride of Assyria (Israel's former oppressor from the north) shall be brought down, and the sceptre of Egypt (Israel's enemy from the south) shall depart." (Zech.10:11)

But these two empires may also represent Gentile world-power in general, which will then give way to the Kingdom of the Messiah which the God of heaven shall set up, Whose blessed rule shall extend from Mount Zion even unto the ends of the earth.

And not only will the Shepherd of Israel gather them and lead them back to their own habitation, removing by His Almighty power and grace every obstacle out of the way, but there in their own land, when the Spirit shall have been poured upon them from on high, they shall be "strong in the Lord and in the power of His might," and ready to do exploits in His name. "I will strengthen them in Jehovah" we read in the last verse of our chapter, "and in His Name shall they walk up and down"—which last expression may denote first their life, or walk and conversation, which shall all be rooted in God, and be in full accord with "His Name" which stands for His revealed character, which shall then be fully and gloriously manifested in their midst in the person of their Messiah, the image of the invisible God. But the phrase u-bhish'mo yithallakhu, probably means also that they shall walk up and down in His Name, as His messengers and representatives, dispensing the blessings of Messiah's gospel among the nations by whom they shall be known as the "priests of Jehovah," and be welcomed as "the ministers of our God," neum Yehovah—"the saying, or 'utterance,' of Jehovah."

These are the last words of the chapter, and form, so to say, the signature which stands pledged to the fulfilment of the contents of the prophecy.

And yet even evangelical writers and commentators deny that there ever will be a literal fulfilment of these plain and solemn predictions, and see in them at the most only forecasts of the gradual spread of Christianity and of the absorption of a certain number of Jews into the Church. Thus, one German scholar, after summarizing the contents of the whole prophecy from ch. 9:11 to the end of ch. 10, says: "The principle of fulfilment is of a spiritual kind, and was effected through the gathering of the Jews into the Kingdom of Christ, which commenced in the times of the Apostles, and will continue till the remnant of Israel is converted to Christ its Savior."

And another, to whose elaborate and, in some respects, useful work reference has often been made in these "notes," says: "In the remarkable position occupied by Israel in the early Christian Church—for our Lord and His apostles were Jews, and the majority of the early evangelists were men of this nation—in the wonderful fact that the Jews, though politically crushed beneath the Gentile yoke, conquered the nations of the earth by means of that religion which sprang from their midst—in such facts this prophecy, and other similar prophecies, found a most glorious and real fulfilment. The nations have been enlightened by the Jews, and books written by Jewish pens have become the laws and oracles of the world."

But, as I have had occasion to remark more than once, such method of interpretation turns the great prophetic utterances in the Bible into mere hyperbole, and substitutes an unnatural and shadowy meaning for what is plain and obvious, thereby throwing a vagueness and uncertainty over all Scripture. No, no; just as the scattering of Israel was literal, so the gathering also will be literal; and it is not in the absorption of a remnant of the Jewish people into the Church, and in the gradual spread of "Christianity" that "these prophecies find a most glorious and real fulfilment," which shall yet be the center of the Kingdom of God and of His Christ, and the channel of blessing to all the nations of the earth.

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Make a map of the area now possessed by Israel and compare it with a map of Israel during the time of Joshua and David. How important is it for Israel to have complete control of Jerusalem?

Zechariah 11:1-17

The 11th chapter stands in the same relation to the verbal prophecies which make up the second part of Zechariah, as the 5th does in relation to the first part of the visions.

"All the ways of the Lord are mercy and truth." . . . And again, "I will sing of mercy and of judgment; unto Thee, O Lord, will I sing."

These words of the inspired Psalmist may, as an old writer well observes, be written over the whole Book of Zechariah.

In the first part we have first a series of five visions which in various symbols set forth "the good and comfortable words" of promise concerning restoration, enlargement, and temporal and spiritual blessing which God has yet in store for the land and the people of Israel. But to complete the prophetic forecast of the future, and also (to borrow an expression from another writer) "to prevent an abuse of the proclamation of salvation," the obverse side of the picture, which sets forth a yet future apostasy and judgment, had to be presented. This is done in the visions of the Flying Roll and the Ephah, in the first of which we hear God's great curse pronounced against sin; and in the second we see its banishment from His own land and presence "to the land of Shinar"—the original place of rebellion and apostasy against God—where it shall meet with its final doom.

In the 6th chapter, however, we emerge again from the dark valley of sin and apostasy, and we are shown in the symbolical transaction there set forth how, in spite of it all, Israel's Messiah will yet be crowned, and sit and rule upon His throne, and be a Priest upon His throne; and how, not only Israel, but "they that are far off," shall find a place in the glorious temple which He shall build.

And thus it is also with the second part. First, we have a series of verbal prophecies, which are full of promise of future restoration and blessedness; and then, in order to prevent a carnal misuse of the promises of salvation on the part of the godless majority in the nation, and also as a hint that the full realization of the promises was, from the prophet's point of view, in the yet distant future—we are suddenly in the 11th chapter brought to the precipice of a tremendous gulf of national apostasy and consequent judgment.

But even from this deep abyss we shall emerge again in the last three chapters, where Israel's national repentance and mourning over Him whom they have sold for thirty pieces of silver, and "pierced," are depicted for us in inspired language, which reads almost like history instead of prophecy. And the end and blessed issue of Israel's national conversion and reunion with their Messiah will be, that "Jehovah will be King-over all the earth: in that day shall Jehovah be One, and His Name One." (Zech. 14:9)

The first brief section into which our chapter is divided, consisting of verses 1-3, may be regarded as the prelude of what follows. In dramatic style the prophet announces the desolating judgment which will sweep over the whole land:

"Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars,

"Howl, O fir-tree, for the cedar is fallen, because the goodly ones are spoiled: howl, O ye oaks of Bashan, for the strong forest is come down.

"A voice of the howling of the shepherds! for their glory is spoiled: a voice of the roaring of young lions! for the pride of Jordan is spoiled."

There is a blending of the literal with the figurative in these verses. The primary reference is very probably to the physical desolation which is to befall the land in consequence of its being invaded by an enemy. The progress of the devastating scourge, which is here depicted, has been graphically described by another:

"Lebanon is bidden to open its doors; that is, its steep mountain paths, in order that the fire of the enemy might consume its cedars. The firs, or cypresses, are called upon to howl or lament because the cedars are fallen; for if the more excellent and valuable trees were felled without mercy, the poor firs and cypresses must needs expect a similar fate.

"From the heights of Lebanon the destructive storm sweeps down on the land of Bashan, and the oaks—the pride of the land (with their kindly shade from the burning heat)—are likewise felled by the enemy to meet the wants of the invading army, and to construct his means of offence and defence. Thus, the wood hitherto practically inaccessible is brought low. The desolating storm sweeps from the high lands to the low lands. The very shepherds are forced to howl, because their splendor is laid waste; namely, the pasturelands in which they were wont to feed and tend their flocks in the day of peace and quiet. The conflagration extends even to the south of the land. Judah is wrapped in flames. The close thickets which fringed the Jordan River, as it ran along through the territory of the southern kingdom, are consumed by the fire. The thickets which shut in that stream so closely that its waters could not be seen till the traveller was close on its banks, which were wont to be the abode of lions and other beasts of prey in those days, are likewise described as destroyed. 'The pride of Jordan' is rendered desolate, and hence the voice of roaring of lions is heard wailing over the general ruin."

But while the physical desolation of the land is that which is primarily set forth in this brief opening section of the chapter, there is also contained in it, if not directly, at least indirectly, an announcement of a destructive judgment of the people, "inasmuch as the desolation of the land also involves the destruction of the people living in it."

Most interpreters, indeed, both Jewish and Christian, regard the language as figurative. Thus, the "cedars" are taken to mean the highest and noblest in the land, while the "cypresses," or "firs," represent the common people, who are commanded to "howl," because since the "cedars" have fallen there is no hope of their being spared. Certainly in Ezek. 17:3 the family of David is represented by a lofty cedar, and in Isa. 14:8 and Jer. 22:6-7 the cedars of Lebanon stand as "the emblem of the glory of the Jewish State." But even though "the scientific expositor" may regard the allegorical interpretation of this particular passage as "fanciful," and we ourselves would by no means wholly commit ourselves to it, it is none the less of interest that a very ancient Jewish interpretation identifies Lebanon here with the Temple "which was built with cedars from Lebanon, towering aloft upon a strong summit—the spiritual glory and eminence of Jerusalem, as the Lebanon was of the whole country." Thus Kimchi, after explaining these verses as a prophecy of the destruction of the kings of the Gentile nations, in accordance with the interpretation of the Targum of Jonathan, who paraphrases, "A voice of the howling of the shepherds because their glory is spoiled" (v. 3), as: "The voice of the crying of the kings because their provinces are desolated," he says: "This interpretation is according to the Targum, but our Rabbis of blessed memory have interpreted the chapter of the desolation of the Second Temple, and Lebanon is the Holy Temple."

But whether literal or figurative, the passage announces a judgment which would embrace, as already stated, the land and the people, and not stop short of the holy city, or sanctuary.

In the next and longest section of the chapter (vv. 4-14), the prophet proceeds to set forth the causes and the manner of the judgment which in the first three verses had been announced in general terms.

Let us first take the briefest possible glimpse at the main contents of this paragraph: Israel, prophetically viewed as given over to judgment, is called (tson ha-haregah), "sheep of slaughter," or, "of slaughtering."

As a manifestation of God's mercy, however, an effort is to be made to save them. The prophet, representing the Lord as the True Shepherd of Israel, is commanded to feed them, and he, in obedience to the command, takes upon himself the office of the shepherd and endeavors to rescue them from the wicked shepherds who are leading them to certain destruction. The obstinacy of the majority of those whom he seeks to save, however, compels him to give up the office and leave the flock to their utter misery and ruin. Then (in order to make manifest the ingratitude, as well as the wickedness, of those on whom such care had in vain been bestowed) the shepherd asks for his wages, and they in mockery offer him thirty pieces of silver—the sum which, according to the law, was to be paid in compensation for a slave who had been killed (Ex. 21:22). This money the prophet, by God's command, throws down contemptuously in the Temple, in the presence of all the people, "to the potter," after which he breaks the last emblem of his relation to them as shepherd.

This is the briefest outline which we shall endeavor to fill in when we come to the exposition, but before doing this one or two further preliminary remarks are still necessary.

(1) As just stated, the prophet must be viewed as acting in this chapter not in his own person, but, in a very special sense, as the representative of God. This is clear from such expressions as, "I cut off three shepherds in one month" (v. 8), "that I might break my covenant which I have made with all the peoples" (v. 10), etc.; which neither Zechariah nor any other prophet did, or could do, but the Lord only.

Hengstenberg, Pusey, and others think that the prophet acts here directly as the type, or representative, of the Angel of Jehovah or the Messiah; but to this most modern commentators object, on the ground that, while in the visions recorded in the first part of Zechariah the Angel of Jehovah is indeed spoken of as an actor, "no intimation whatever is given in this chapter that the Angel of Jehovah is to be regarded as the doer of the things which are here related, and we have no right to assume that the prophecy is a continuation of the visions in the earlier part of this book."

But it practically comes to much the same thing, whether we regard the prophet as representing in his actions as shepherd, Jehovah, or more directly the Messiah, for the coming of the Messiah is often spoken of in the Old Testament as the coming of Jehovah. In Ezek. 34, for instance, Jehovah Himself is represented, in His capacity as the true Shepherd of Israel, as seeking, saving, strengthening, healing, and satisfying His people; but as we read on in that chapter we become aware that it is not Jehovah directly who is going to do all this, but mediately through the Messiah. "And I will set them up one shepherd over them, and He shall feed them, even My servant David; He shall feed them, and He shall be their shepherd"—namely, the true David, the Messiah, as the Jews themselves have always rightly interpreted this passage.

And so it is always: in all His relations and dealings with men, both in mercy and in judgment, it is God in Christ who acts. As a matter of fact, this prophecy (as is admitted by one who is not inclined to see many references to Christ in the Book of Zechariah) "is one of a peculiarly Messianic character, and (as we shall see more clearly farther on) what Jehovah is said here to perform was done in very deed by the Messiah."

(2) The second preliminary question to be settled is the time to which this prophecy, and more especially the symbolical action described in verses 7-14, is to be referred.

Two or three Jewish commentators, who are influenced in their interpretations by their hostility to Christianity, and some of the "modern" rationalistic Christian theologians, to whom Christ and the New Testament are non-existent, or of no account in their interpretations of the Old Testament, refer it to some event, or events, which they imagine occurred in the time of the First Temple before the Babylonian Exile.

A full and lengthy refutation of this view is, however, supplied by another Jewish commentator, namely, Abarbanel. One argument of his is, of itself, quite sufficient "To what purpose," he asks, "should God show the prophet past events, which he had seen with his own eyes and with the eyes of his father; and what necessity was there to make known to him the captivity of the tribes and the desolation of the first house, which had occurred but a short time before; and (above all) to do this in parables, which are only employed in reference to the future, to make events known before they happen? But with regard to the past, information is not conveyed in parables. It is not possible to suppose that God would communicate a plain matter of recent history in obscure symbols, and, therefore, the symbolical representation cannot refer to the past, and must predict what was to happen during the time of the Second Temple."

But even among those who rightly apply this prophecy to the time of the Second Temple, there is still a difference of opinion. According to some, the whole of the dealings of God with Israel during the time of the Second Temple are alluded to. This is the view of most of the Jewish interpreters and of eminent Christian commentators. Thus, according to Calvin, "the Lord discharged the duties of a shepherd by means of all His faithful servants in the time of the Second Temple, but most perfectly of all by Christ"; and Koehler sees in this scripture "a representation of the mediatorial work in the plan of salvation, of which Daniel was the first representative, and which was afterwards exhibited on the one hand by Haggai and Zechariah, and on the other hand by Zerubbabel and his successors as the civil rulers of Israel, and by Joshua and those priests who resumed the duties of their office along with him." But the ground on which this view is chiefly based—namely, that because the prophecy in chs. 9 and 10 embraces the whole period of the Second Temple, from Alexander the Great to the coming of Christ, and even merging into the time of the end—therefore, this one in ch. 11 must be equally comprehensive, and start from the same historical point of time, is, to say the least, a very uncertain one.

For my own part, I believe that the more carefully we look into this solemn scripture, the more manifest it becomes that the state of things which it prophetically depicts answers exactly to the condition of the Jewish nation immediately preceding the final catastrophe at the destruction of the Second Temple, and the dissolution of the Jewish polity by the Romans, and does not correspond to their condition and experience during the whole, or even greater part, of their history after the partial restoration from Babylon.

For this, and other reasons which for lack of space I cannot enter here, I must confess myself on the side of those who view this 11th chapter as restricted to the principal object of the preceding great prophecy (ch. 9 and 10), namely, the prediction concerning the coming of the Messiah (9:9-10), which is in this 11th chapter presented from another point of view, in order that the meaning may be fully understood, and "not be so perverted by a one-sided and worldly interpretation as to become pernicious instead of salutary"; or, in other words, that this prophecy refers particularly to the office of shepherd which was to be filled by the Messiah, and to His blessed labors and experience in seeking to save the "lost sheep of the house of Israel."

Let us now examine the scripture itself. There is discussion among commentators whether the phrase tson ha-haregah—"sheep of slaughter," describes the Jewish nation as a flock which is already being slaughtered, or as one which is marked out for slaughter at a future time. There is no doubt that the condition of the people was deplorable enough in the time of the prophet, for already in the 10th chapter he describes them as those who "go their way (or 'wander') like sheep," and "are 'afflicted' (or 'oppressed') because there is no shepherd."

Already they were a prey to false shepherds, and subject to the abuse and oppression of their own unfaithful civil and religious rulers and foreign tyrants; but, as may be gathered from the introductory remarks, I regard it as a special prophetic designation of the people during the time to which this prophecy has particular reference when it became more terribly and literally true.

The 5th verse illustrates the truth of the designation in the 4th verse. They may, indeed, be described as sheep of slaughter, for "their possessors (literally, 'buyers') slay (or 'strangle') them, and hold themselves not guilty; and they that sell them say, Blessed be Jehovah, for I am rich."

The buyers and sellers are those into whose hands the nation is delivered, and who do with them as they please, namely, the Gentile powers. They are represented as thinking themselves "not guilty" in all their cruel actions in relation to the Jewish people. This reminds us of Jer. 1:6-7, which was most probably before the mind of Zechariah. "My people hath been lost sheep: their shepherds have caused them to go astray: . . . all that found them have devoured them: and their adversaries say we offend not (are 'not guilty'), because, they have sinned against Jehovah, the habitation of justice, Jehovah, the hope of their fathers."

But, though it is true that Israel on account of their most terrible sins have been handed over by God as a righteous punishment into the hands of the Gentile world powers, they are not held innocent for their cruel deeds towards them. This we see from the same 50th chapter of Jeremiah, where God says: "Israel is a scattered sheep; the lions (the Gentile world-powers) who are likened to ferocious wild beasts have driven him away: first the king of Assyria hath devoured him; and last this Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones. Therefore thus saith Jehovah of hosts, the God of Israel: Behold, I will punish the king of Babylon and his land, as I have punished the king of Assyria."

And what God did to Assyria and Babylon, He did also to Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome, and still will do to nations and individuals whom He uses as a scourge against His own people, for His word in another part of Jeremiah still holds true: "Therefore all they that devour thee shall be devoured; and all thine adversaries, every one of them, shall go into captivity; and they that spoil thee shall be a spoil; and all they that prey upon thee will I give for a prey."

But to return more directly to our scripture. Not only will they be thus abused and "slain" by Gentile oppressors, but "their own shepherds," by which we must understand their own civil and religious rulers, those who ought to have fed and defended them—"pity them not"—thus proving themselves false shepherds, who only sought their own, and were the chief cause of the sheep becoming a prey.

There is a sad gradation in the wretchedness of the people thus given over to judgment, as described in verses 5-6. First, the Gentile nations pity them not, but buy and sell and slay them as "sheep of slaughter." Secondly, their own shepherds, from whom something different might have been expected, have no compassion for them; and thirdly, and most terrible of all, "I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land, saith Jehovah" for long-continued obduracy exhausts even the patience of Jehovah; and there comes a time in the history of nations and of individuals when the long-suffering God has to say "there is no more remedy" (or "healing"), and His righteous anger has to manifest itself in judgment.

In the solemn words of the 6th verse we have a forecast of what would take place after the rejection of the Good Shepherd, and the care and protection of God over His people would be withdrawn. God's anger will show itself, not only in a negative manner ("I will no more pity"), but also in a positive way:

"And, lo" (or "behold"), this is God's way of calling attention to something great which He is going to do either with nations or individuals—"I will deliver the men every one into the hands of his neighbor, and into the hand of his king: and they shall smite" (literally, 'break down,' i.e., lay waste) the land"—solemn and awful words which well describe in advance the confusion, captious strife, hatred, and mutual destruction, which followed soon after the rejection of our Lord Jesus, their true Messiah and Shepherd, the detailed accounts of which may be read in Josephus, and even in the Talmud.

A parallel passage is found in Jer. 19:9, which was fulfilled in the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and the destruction of the First Temple: "And I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and they shall eat every one the flesh of his friend in the siege and in the straitness, wherewith their enemies, and they that seek their lives, shall straiten them"—where also a twofold cause of their ruin is given, namely, strife among themselves, which is heightened by sufferings and oppression inflicted by the foe without. Contention within, and the enemy without, are not only mentioned in the passage just quoted from Jeremiah, but they are linked together by Zechariah himself in ch. 8:10, as the two chief methods of punishment employed by God for the chastisement of His people. "There was no peace to him that went out or came in because of the adversary, and I set all men every one against his neighbor"—"which miserable state of things existed before the Babylonian Captivity and is represented in the 11th chapter as returning with still greater force on account of the base ingratitude and relapse into apostasy on the part of the people." (Hengstenberg)

The phrase, "into the hand of his king" must be understood as referring to the king of "his," i.e., Judah's own choice. That it is of a foreign oppressor, and not of a native ruler, that the prophecy speaks, is evident, among other things, from the fact that the Jews had no king at the time of Zechariah, and that this prophet never (either in the first or second half of the book), even in his descriptions of the future, speaks of any king, with the exception of the Messiah.

When, on that fateful eve of the Passover, Pilate brought Jesus out before the Jews, and half in mockery said, "Behold your king," they cried, "Away with him, crucify him!" and when he again appealed, "Shall I crucify your king?" the chief priests, who constituted themselves the leaders of the people, answered: "We have no king but Caesar!" and, having thus deliberately made this terrible choice, they were "delivered" into Caesar's hand; and soon after the Roman armies, under Vespasian and Titus, laid waste the land and destroyed the people. How terrible was the retribution. "If we let this man stay alone," said the chief priests and Pharisees in council, "all men will believe on him, and the Romans will come and take away both our place and our nation." So they decided to carry out the wicked counsel of Caiaphas, who said: "It is expedient for you that one man die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not," and handed Him over to the Romans. But the very thing they feared, and on account of which they decided on committing the great national crime of betraying their Kinsman-Redeemer into the hands of the Gentiles, came upon them, for these very Romans did come, "and take away both their place and their nation."

As far as the purpose of God with the Jewish nation is concerned, it ever abides unchanged and unalterable, for the unchangeable God remains true and faithful, though all men prove liars. This same prophet, who in the 11th chapter predicts Israel's rejection of the Good Shepherd, and their consequent rejection of God for a time, graphically describes in the last three chapters, which deal with the last events of this age, Israel's restoration and conversion when the spirit of grace and of supplication shall be poured upon them, and they shall bitterly lament and repent of their great national sin, and look upon Him whom they have pierced.

And this is in accord also with the clear statements of the New Testament, which tells us that "all Israel shall be saved, even as it is written: There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob; for this is My covenant unto them when I shall take away their sins."

And even in the generation of which the terrible words are written, "I will not deliver them out of their hands," there were "the poor of the flock" (vv. 7, 11) who did "give heed" and "knew the word of Jehovah," who (as we shall see) are none other than the remnant, according to the election of grace, which, blessed be God has never been wanting even in the darkest period of Israel's history.

We proceed to what may be said to constitute the heart of this remarkable prophecy, namely, the actual "feeding," or shepherding, of the flock which, through their own obstinacy, became "the flock of slaughter."

"So I fed the flock of slaughter, verily the poor of the flock. And I took unto me two staves: the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands, and I fed the flock. And I cut off the three shepherds in one month; for my soul was weary of them, and their soul also loathed me. Then said I, I will not feed you: that that dieth, let it die; and that that is to be cut off, let it be cut off; and let them which are left eat every one the flesh of another. And I took my staff Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the peoples. And it was broken in that day; and thus the poor of the flock that gave heed unto me knew that it was the word of the Lord. And I said unto them, If ye think good, give me my hire; and if not, forbear. So they weighed for my hire thirty pieces of silver. And the Lord said unto me, Cast it unto the potter, the goodly price that I was prized at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them unto the potter, in the house of the Lord. Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel" (Zech. 11:7-14).

We may pause for a moment to ask whether the symbolical transaction which is here described was an inward or outward one. Most of the Jewish commentators take the latter view. Thus Abarbanel, for instance, says: "God commanded the prophet to perform a real action, and in a waking state, which action was to be an intimation and a sign of that which was to happen in God's dealings with Israel," and adds: "By attending to the affairs of the prophets thou mayest know that God, blessed be He, sometimes commanded them to perform real actions, and in a waking state, and afterwards explained to them the reason of the command according to the sign that was in them. . . . But sometimes the blessed God commanded the prophets to do things foreign to their character, and unnecessary for them to do; which things were also to be a sign and a type (foreshadow) of coming events, and did not expound the meaning, because He knew that the thing itself could be understood" (as, for instance, Isa. 8:1-2; Ezek. 4:1-2, 5:1). But, as has been observed, the narrative in this chapter differs in some respects from the symbolical actions of the prophets and from Zechariah's own visions.

"The symbolical actions of the prophets are actions of their own: this involves acts which it would be impossible to represent, except as a sort of drama. Such are the very central points, the feeding of the flock, which yet are intelligent men who understand God's doings: the cutting off of the three shepherds; the asking for the price; the unworthy price offered; the casting it aside. It differs from Zechariah's own visions, in that they are for the most part exhibited to the eye, and Zechariah's own part is simply to inquire their meaning and to learn it, and to receive further revelation. In one case only (ch. 3:5) he himself interposes in the action of the vision; but this, too, as asking that it might be done, not as himself doing it. Here (in ch. 11) he is himself the actor, yet as representing Another, Who alone could cut off shepherds, abandon the people to mutual destruction, annulling the covenant which He had made." Maimonides, then, seems to say rightly: "This, 'I fed the flock of the slaughter,' to the end of the narrative, where he is said to have asked for his hire, to have received it, and to have cast it into the Temple, to the treasurer—all this Zechariah saw in prophetic vision. For the command which he received, and the act which he is said to have done, took place in prophetic vision or dream. This, he adds, 'is beyond controversy, as all know who are able to distinguish the possible from the impossible.'"

Let us bear in mind also that, as has been well observed by an old writer, the actions of the prophets are not always to be understood as actions, but as predictions—as, for instance, when God commands Isaiah to "make the heart of the people fat and their ears heavy" (Isa. 6:10); or when He says that He appointed Jeremiah over the nations, "to root out, and to break down, and to destroy, and to overthrow, and to build, and to plant" (Jer. 1:10); or when He commanded the same prophet to cause the nations to drink the cup whereby they should be bereft of their senses (Jer. 25:15-27). Neither Isaiah nor Jeremiah actually did this, but foretold in advance in this manner what would be. So it is here.

But to proceed to the exposition. And, first, I will deal with what I believe to be a parenthetical sentence in the 7th verse, which occurs again in the 11th verse, and which has greatly puzzled the commentators, and of which all sorts of explanations have been given: "So I fed," we read, "the sheep of slaughter"; after which there follow the three Hebrew words, lachen aniyye hatson, which the Authorised Version has rendered, "Even you, O poor of the flock"; and the Revised Version, "Verily, the poor of the flock"; and the explanation usually given is that "the poor of the flock" is practically only another name for "the sheep of slaughter." But this is very unsatisfactory, for, first, the primary and natural meaning of the adverb lachen, is not "even" or "verily," but "therefore"; and secondly, the designation "aniyye ka-am" "the poor of the people," or, as the word also means, "the needy," "the weak," "the afflicted," is almost invariably used in the Hebrew Bible of the pious or godly in the nation who are persecuted and oppressed by the godless—of those whom the wicked in his pride "hotly pursue," or persecute, but who, knowing God to be their refuge, can look up to Him and say: "But I am poor and needy, yet the Lord thinketh upon me."

Certainly in the 11th verse the "aniyye hatson" who "observed" the prophet, and knew that it was the word of Jehovah, must refer to the God-fearing portion of the nation. In brief, I believe that the sentence should be rendered, "therefore (on this account) the poor of the flock," and that in these three words in the Hebrew there is summed up the result, or blessed fruit of the labors of the Good Shepherd. Not altogether in vain, or fruitless, would His self-sacrificing effort to save the lost sheep of the House of Israel prove. The mass would indeed prove obstinate, and by rejecting Him choose death rather than life, and thus experience the truth of the awful designation, tsen ha-haregah, "sheep of slaughter"; but, as has been the case even in the very darkest periods of Israel's history, God would leave in the midst of them "an afflicted and poor people," who would trust in the Name of Jehovah, the remnant according to the election of grace, in and through whom the purposes of God would be carried forward. The New Testament parallel and ultimate fulfillment is in John 1:11: "He came unto His own, and they that were His received Him not. But as many as received Him, to them gave He the right (or 'power') to become children of God, even to them that believe in His Name."

"The elect are the end of all God's dispensations," observes another writer. "He fed all; yet the fruit of His feeding, His toils, His death, the travail of His soul, was in those only who are saved. So also the apostle says: 'Therefore, I endure all things for the elects' sake, that they also may obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory.' He fed all; but the poor of the flock alone, those who were despised of men because they would not follow the pride of the high priests and scribes and Pharisees, believed on Him."

On entering his office as shepherd, the prophet "took two staves." The Eastern shepherd, to quote from Dr. Thomson's The Land and the Book, "invariably carries a staff or rod with him when he goes forth to feed his flock. It is often bent, or hooked, at one end, which gave rise to the shepherd's crook in the hand of the Christian bishop. With this staff he rules and guides the flock to their green pastures, and defends them from their enemies. With it, also, he corrects them when disobedient, and brings them back when wandering. This staff is associated as inseparably with the shepherd as the goad (a pointed rod used to urge on an animal) is with the ploughman."

That on certain occasions, at any rate, it was customary for the shepherd to have not only one but two staves—one for keeping off wild beasts and thieves, and the other for feeding the flock;—is manifest from the reference so familiar to us in the 23rd Psalm: "Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me."

The names of the staves, like everything else in this symbolical transaction, were significant. One he called noam, which means "beauty," "pleasantness," "favor"—and had reference, as we see from the 10th verse, to the grace and loving-kindness of God in keeping off their enemies from destroying them; and the other he called kobhlím, "bands," or literally "binders," and symbolized, as we see from the 14th verse, that part of the shepherd's rule by which the sheep were kept united among themselves as one flock. "And so" (thus equipped), he says again at the end of the 7th verse, "I fed the flock."

The second half of the 9th verse describes the rupture between the Good Shepherd and the people as a whole, including those who ought to have acted as shepherds, but only misled and devoured the flock. It also, it seems to me, indicates the reason why "the three shepherds" were cut off.

Commentators generally view the cutting off of the three shepherds "as an act of God's loving-kindness toward the sheep of His pasture," and as part of the beneficent care of the Good Shepherd for the flock. So it might have been, if delivered from their false shepherds, the people as a whole had turned to Him Who was sent to them of God to seek and to save, and Who in His one person combined the offices of Prophet, Priest, and King. But as not only the leaders, both civil and religious, but the people in general, took up more and more an attitude of opposition and hostility toward Him, the "cutting off" of the three "shepherds," or the abolition of the three mediatorial offices, which is the outward sign of the suspension of God's covenant relationship with them, must certainly be regarded also as an act of judgment on the nation as a whole.

And, if it be asked, what other expression of the beneficent activity of the Good Shepherd on behalf of the sheep of slaughter do we find in this prophecy, if the cutting off of the shepherds is not to be regarded as an effort on His part for the deliverance of the flock, my answer is, that a full, though compressed, summary of the beneficent character of the activities of the Good Shepherd is given in the 8th verse. There we see the Shepherd fully equipped with the two staves of Beauty (or "Favor"), and "Bands" (or "Binders"), feeding the flock. "So I fed the flock"; and in that blessed shepherding everything was included—protection and deliverance from without, and safety, guidance, and provision within. Oh! that my people had hearkened unto His voice, and that Israel had walked in His ways! Then would it, indeed, have been well with them. Not only would He soon have subdued their enemies and turned His hand in judgment against their adversaries, but their peace should have been as a river, and their righteousness as the waves of the sea.

But the frequent complaint of God of the attitude of His stiff-necked people in the time of the prophets, culminated in their spirit of opposition and hostility to Him, Who was the last and greatest of the prophets, and the very image of God. "My people hearkened not to My voice; Israel would none of Me. So I let them go (or 'sent them forth') after the stubbornness of their heart, that they might walk in their own counsels."

This, in brief, is the meaning of verses 8 and 9: "And my soul was wearied (lit., 'was shortened', i.e., became impatient) with them." Oh! how much stubborn disobedience on the part of the flock is presupposed in this complaint on the part of the shepherd, "And their soul also loathed (bachal—a word expressive of intense disgust) me": sad and solemn words which in their fulness were fulfilled in the intense loathing which the leaders of the Jewish nation manifested to Jesus of Nazareth.

The terrible consequence was, that even the long-suffering of God as manifested in Christ was exhausted; "Then said I, I will not feed you: that which dieth, let it die; and that which perisheth (or 'is cut off'), let it perish; and those that remain, let each one eat the flesh of another"—all which became terribly and literally true when, after the rejection of the Good Shepherd, the terrible calamities of war, famine, pestilence, intestine strife, and mutual destruction overtook the poor deluded people.

The first outward visible sign of the rupture between the Shepherd and the sheep was the breaking of one of the staves: "And I took My staff 'Beauty' (or 'Favor') and cut it asunder, that I might break My covenant which I had made with all the peoples."

This staff was called noam—"Beauty," or "Pleasantness," or "Favor"; because, as already said above, it was the symbol of God's protection over them in keeping off the nations from attacking them from without.

The covenant which He says He will break is not the covenant which He made with the people. The word for people in the original is in the plural, and refers to the Gentile nations, and the covenant is that which God, so to say, made with the Gentile peoples on their behalf. When Israel was in God's favor and under His gracious protection, then He caused even their enemies to be at peace with them; and when the Gentile nations gathered against them ready to devour, the Shepherd of Israel soon broke the arm of their strength and prevented them doing harm to His people. But when He ceased to be their defence, then they became a ready prey to the Gentile world-powers, which are well symbolized in the Bible by wild beasts—"The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it."

Again, however, it is declared in the same word of prophecy that restored and converted Israel will be taken under the special protection of God, and a covenant will be made by Him on their behalf, not only with the nations, but with the beasts of the field. "In that day will I make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground: and I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the land, and will make them to lie down safely. And I will betroth thee unto Me forever; yea, I will betroth thee unto Me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies. I will even betroth thee unto Me in faithfulness: and thou shalt know that I am the Lord."

We proceed to the 11th verse: "And it was broken (namely, 'the covenant') in that day; and thus the poor of the flock that watched Me (or 'gave heed unto Me') knew that it was the word of Jehovah."

The manifest proof that the covenant which the Shepherd of Israel had made with the nations on Israel's behalf was broken, served as a demonstration to the poor of the flock that what had been foretold was indeed the Word of God.

The point of time in the expression "in that day" is prophetic from the prophet's point of view, and refers to the time and events following the breaking off of the relations between the True Shepherd, whom the prophet represented, and the flock. It is true that he speaks of the breaking of the covenant with the nations on Israel's behalf as past, because in the vision which passed before his mind the things described had actually occurred. "If the prophecy," remarks Hengstenberg, "had been couched in literal terms, instead of being clothed in symbol, it would have run thus: When, therefore, My covenant, or treaty, with the nations is brought to an end, those who fear Me will discern in the fulfilment the divine character of this sentence of Mine upon Israel."

By the aniyye hatson—"the poor of the flock"—we can understand (as already explained) nothing else than the believing remnant who were saved out of the "flock of slaughter." They are described as "Hashskomerim othi" rendered "that waited upon Me," in the Authorised Version; and, "they that gave heed unto Me," in the Revised Version. Literally, it is those that "watched with Me," or, "those that observed Me"—that is, "kept their eyes constantly fixed on Me, ready to act according to My direction and will"—a beautiful designation not only of the believing remnant of Israel, but of those from all nations who have learned in truth that what was spoken by prophets and apostles, and Christ Himself, was indeed the Word of the living God, and whose eyes are fixed upon Him with ready obedience to do His will.

We come now to vv. 12 and 13, which form perhaps the most difficult passage in the whole prophecy:

"And I said unto them. If ye think good, give me my hire; and if not, forbear. So they weighed for my hire thirty pieces of silver."

"And the Lord said unto me, Cast it unto the potter, the goodly price that I was prized at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them unto the potter, in the house of the Lord"

As an indication that his service as shepherd was coming to an end, he asks his wages. I need not again remind the reader that we have to do here with symbols and figures, and that the symbolical transaction in the vision in which the prophet was himself the chief actor was designed to set forth great spiritual truths.

That the prophet only represented Jehovah, the true Shepherd of Israel, who in fulness of time was especially to manifest Himself in this character in His only-begotten Son, the Messiah, comes out very clearly in these verses, for the contemptible wages which they did offer, Jehovah says (in v. 13), ironically, is "the goodly price that I was prized at of them."

The wages (sakhar, "hire," or "reward"), which He actually sought from them for all His Shepherd care, was, as the commentators rightly understand, the spiritual fruit of His labors—repentance, faith, true heart piety, humble obedience and grateful love. This is brought out clearly in the Lord's parable of the Vineyard, which is Israel, to whom He first sent His servants, and then. His own Son, "that He might receive the fruits of it."

And although He has every right to demand this "hire," He leaves it to His professed people, upon whom such bounteous care and attention has been lavished by Him, to make a free return to Him of their love and gratitude in order that the actual condition of their hearts towards Him may be thus tested. "Give me," He says, "my 'hire' or 'reward,' for all that I have been and done for you, if you think well (lit., 'if it seem good in your eyes'), and if not, forbear." For, as has been well expressed by another writer, "God does not force our free will or constrain our service. He places life and death before us, and bids us choose life. By His grace alone we can choose Him; but we can refuse His grace and Himself."

That which they did offer the prophet in return for His services is meant to express the black ingratitude of their hearts for the shepherd care of Jehovah. Instead of "wages," as Keil well expresses it, they offer Him an insult—"so they weighed for My hire thirty pieces of silver" which was exactly the amount which, according to the law, was to be paid in compensation for a slave goaded to death by an ox. "And Jehovah said unto me, Cast it" (hishlikh —"fling it" with contempt as a thing unclean) "unto the potter, the goodly price (or, 'the magnificence of the price') that I was prized at of them: so I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them, in the house of Jehovah, unto the potter."

We have now reached the place where we must refer more fully to the fulfilment of this prophecy in our Lord Jesus. As regards the solemn prediction of the chapter as a whole (when viewed in the light of other prophecies in the Old Testament), its chief points have been thus summarized:

(1) That before the destruction of Jerusalem, Jehovah, in the person of the Messiah, would appear as the Shepherd of Israel.

(2) That only "the poor of the flock" would attend to His word; but the rest, both leaders and people, would reject and abhor Him.

(3) That the Good Shepherd should be valued at the price of a common slave.

(4) That the people would in consequence be given over to be the prey of the Gentile powers from without, and to civil feuds within. Now even the most superficial acquaintance with the Gospel narrative, and of the subsequent history of the Jewish people, must lead one to see how strikingly all this has been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth, and in the events which took place in consequence of His rejection by His own nation.

If there had been no allusion at all in the New Testament to this prophecy, we should still, from the mere Gospel narrative, be led to see its true and full fulfilment in Christ. But the New Testament does cite verses 12 and 13 as a direct prophecy of our Lord Jesus. After describing in ch. 26 the betrayal of Jesus by Judas, to whom the chief priests weighed thirty pieces of silver, and His condemnation to death by Pontius Pilate, at the instigation of the high priests and elders of the Jews, the evangelist Matthew proceeds:

"Then Judas, which betrayed Him, when he saw that He was condemned, repented himself, and brought back the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned in that I betrayed innocent blood. But they said, What is that to us? see thou to it. And he cast down the pieces of silver into the sanctuary, and departed; and he went away and hanged himself. And the chief priests took the pieces of silver, and said, It is not lawful to put them into the treasury, since it is the price of blood. And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in. Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of Him that was priced, whom certain of the children of Israel did price; and they gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me." (Matt. 27:3-10)

It has been objected by Jews and others that there are certain discrepancies between the words of the prophecy and its fulfilment as recorded by Matthew. One of the alleged discrepancies is contained in the fact that "in the prophecy the thirty pieces of silver were weighed as wages for the shepherd," whereas in the Gospel narrative they are said to have been paid to Judas for the betrayal of Jesus.

"But, in truth, as soon as we trace back the form of the prophecy to its idea, the difference is resolved into harmony. The payment of the wages to the shepherd in the prophetic announcement is simply the symbolical form in which the nation manifests its ingratitude for the love and fidelity shown towards it by the shepherd, and the sign that it will no longer have him as its shepherd, and therefore a sign of the blackest ingratitude and of hard-heartedness in return for the love displayed by the shepherd. The same ingratitude and the same hardness of heart are manifested in the resolution of the representatives of the Jewish nation, the high priests and elders, to put Jesus, their Savior, to death, and to take Him prisoner by bribing the betrayer. The payment of thirty silverlings to the betrayer was, in fact, the wages with which the Jewish nation repaid Jesus for what He had done for the salvation of Israel; and the contemptible sum which they paid to the betrayer was an expression of the deep contempt which they felt for Jesus."

There is no great importance in this difference, that here the prophet throws the money into the house of Jehovah to the potter; whereas, according to Matthew's account, Judas threw the silverlings into the temple, and the high priests would not put the money into the divine treasury, because it was blood-money, but applied it to the purchase of a potter's field, which received the name of a field of blood. For by this very fact not only was the prophecy almost literally fulfilled; but, so far as the sense is concerned, it was so exactly fulfilled that every one could see that the same God who had spoken through the prophet had, by the secret operation of His omnipotent power, which extends even to the ungodly, so arranged the matter that Judas threw the money into the temple, to bring it before the face of God as blood-money, and to call down the vengeance of God upon the nation; and that the high priest, by purchasing the potter's field for this money, which received the name of 'field of blood' in consequence 'unto this day,' perpetuated the memorial of the sin committed against their Messiah. Matthew indicates this in the words 'as the Lord commanded me,' which correspond to 'and Jehovah said unto me,' in verse 13 of our prophecy; on which H. Aug. W. Meyer has correctly observed, 'That the words, "as the Lord commanded me," express the fact that the application of the wages of treachery to the purchase of the potter's field took place in accordance with the purpose of God, whose command the prophet had received. As God had directed the prophet how to proceed with the thirty silverlings, so was it with the antitypical fulfilment of the prophecy by the high priests, and thus was the purpose of the divine will accomplished."

The retention by the Shepherd of this second staff for some time after the first had already been broken, is probably meant to indicate His reluctance to give up the flock which had been so dear to Him, and His waiting to the very end to be gracious to them if they had but turned from their evil ways. His very request for His "wages," or "hire," after the first staff was broken, was really, if they had only properly understood it, a call to repentance; but instead of "fruit" as the result of His care and blessed labors, they brought Him forth the "wild grapes" of contempt and black ingratitude. And thus reluctantly He had to give over "the dearly beloved of His soul," not only into the hands of their enemies without, which was symbolized by the breaking of the first staff called "Noam" but the still more terrible calamity of civil strife and destructive feuds among themselves, which is symbolized by the breaking of the staff called Hobhlím ("Bands" or "Binders").

The achavah, "brotherhood," which was to be destroyed "between Judah and between Israel," is not to be understood in the sense "that the unity of the nation would be broken up again in a manner similar to that in the days of Rehoboam, and that two hostile nations would be formed out of one people," although the disruption of national unity which took in the days of Jeroboam may be referred to as an illustration of that which would occur again in a more serious form. "The schism of Jeroboam had a weakening and disintegrating effect on the nation of the twelve tribes, and the dissolution of the brotherhood here spoken of was to result in still greater evil and ruin; for Israel, deprived of the Good Shepherd, was to fall into the power of the 'foolish,' or 'evil,' shepherd, who is depicted at the close of the prophecy."

The preposition bein, which is twice repeated, has the meaning not only of "between," but also of "among," and the formula, House of Judah and House of Israel, or simply, "Judah and Israel," is, as we have had again and again to notice, this prophet's inclusive designation of the whole ideally (and to a large extent already actually) reunited one people. I think, therefore, that we may rightly render the sentence "to destroy the brotherhood among Judah and among Israel"—that is to say, among the entire nation. The consequence of it would be the fulfilment of the threat in the 9th verse: "Let them which are left eat every one the flesh of another"—solemn and awful words, which, as already shown above, had their first literal fulfilment in the party feuds and mutually destructive strife, and in the terrible "dissolution of every bond of brotherhood and of our common nature, which made the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans a proverb for horror, and precipitated its destruction."

There remains yet one act in this prophetic drama which sets forth the terrible fact that as a consequence of their rejection of the Good Shepherd they would be given over to the domination of one who would be the very opposite of Him Who came to seek and to save that which was lost.

"And Jehovah said unto me, Take unto thee yet again the instruments of a foolish shepherd."

The word od ("yet again") connects this action with the previous one (vv. 4-8), for it implies that the prophet had already acted in the capacity, and had had in his hands the emblems of the shepherd's office once before. The adjective evili (the sound of which is very much like the English word evil)—expresses more than the English rendering "foolish" given in this passage. It may almost be rendered "wicked." "Folly and sin were almost identical terms in the eyes of the sacred writers," and the word is frequently used as the synonym for ungodliness.

What the instruments of the foolish shepherd were, and in what respects they differed from those of the Good Shepherd, are matters for speculation, since we are not told. Hengstenberg supposes that the "instruments of the foolish shepherd consisted of a strong stick mounted with iron, with which the sheep were hurt and wounded, whereas the Good Shepherd was wont to keep the sheep in order with a thin staff and gentle strokes"; but this is only conjecture.

The interpretation of this symbolical act is given by God Himself: "For I will raise up a shepherd in the land, which shall not visit (or 'observe' or 'care for') that which is cut off (or 'perishing'), neither shall he seek those that be scattered, nor heal that which is broken; neither shall he feed that 'which is sound (lit., 'standeth,' i.e., the strong), but he shall eat the flesh of the fat, and shall tear their hoofs in pieces."

The heartlessness and cruelty of this evil shepherd is strikingly described—first in a negative, and then in a positive, manner. Not only will he be utterly indifferent alike to the needs of those who are ready to perish as to those who are still sound, but he will positively devour the flock. He will even "tear their hoofs in pieces," not "by driving them along rough and stony roads," as Ewald and others explain, but "so that when he consumes the sheep he even splits or tears in pieces the claws to seize upon and swallow the last morsel of flesh or fat."

And the most solemn fact in this forecast is that God says, "I will raise up" such a shepherd in the land. Yes, He will raise him up in the same sense as He raised up the Assyrians, the Babylonians, and the Romans, i.e., as His scourge upon a godless generation.

And the readiness of the "sheep of slaughter" to follow such a shepherd will be but part of the punishment for their rejection of the Good Shepherd.

But who is meant by this foolish or wicked shepherd?

Jewish commentators interpret it of Herod; some Christian interpreters, like Hengstenberg, apply it to "all the evil native Jewish rulers collectively," who, subsequent to the rejection of Christ, oppressed and devoured the flock, and ultimately brought about their own ruin; others again identify him with the imperial Roman power. Thus, in the words of one of the advocates of this view, "the Jews rejected Christ, the King of Israel, and accepted the Emperor of Rome. In the madness of their rage against Jesus of Nazareth, they cried out: 'We have no king but Caesar.' They obtained their choice, and found it bitterness in the latter end." "The description" (in v. 16), the same writer proceeds, "is given in language suitable to the character of an evil shepherd under which the Roman Empire is described. It is strikingly similar in meaning to that given of the fourth, or Roman word-empire in the Book of Daniel, as a wild beast more dreadful, terrible, and strong than those beasts that were before it, furnished with great iron teeth and brazen claws, devouring, breaking in pieces, and stamping even the residue of its prey under its feet (Dan. 7:7, 19, 23)".

I have set forth this view at some length, because I believe that a reference to Rome as the more immediate scourge of God in the punishment of Israel after their rejection of Christ is probably included in this prophecy, and this is in accordance with the explanation I have given of the words in the 6th verse, "I will deliver the men every one . . . into the hand of his king." But whatever partial reference to Imperial Rome there may be in this scripture, and however many evil and foolish shepherds there have already arisen since the words were uttered who have devoured the Jewish flock, the full and final fulfilment of this solemn prophecy will take place in the final phase of the development of the fourth great world-power (i.e., the Roman), when amid the ten horns, or kingdoms, there shall come up "a little horn" who shall be master of them all, and in whom all the beast-like qualities of apostate anti-Christian world-power shall be concentrated and reach their climax.

For just as the Good Shepherd, whose part the prophet acted in the first part of the chapter, is in the highest and truest sense none other than the Messiah, so the "foolish," or wicked, shepherd is in the last resort none other than the one who is in every sense his opposite—the personal Antichrist, under whose brief reign all Israel's previous sorrows and sufferings shall reach their climax in the final great tribulation; even though it may be granted that, as in the case of the Christ, so of the Antichrist, there have been, so to say, shadowy precursors in whom a certain partial historical fulfilment of the prophecy may be discernible.

And he will indeed be the "foolish" shepherd; for as the Messiah is sometimes spoken of as Wisdom personified, so the Antichrist, in spite of his being wise in all the wisdom which is from beneath, will be the very embodiment of folly; for (to quote from an old writer) "since the extremes! folly consists in the extremest wickedness, he will be the most foolish who reacheth the highest impiety, and this he will do by arrogating to himself divinity, and claiming divine honors."

But the career of this evil shepherd shall be short, and his end will be sudden destruction—"Woe to the idol (or 'worthless') shepherd"—the prophecy ends, or, as some would render, the shepherd of "nothingness" or "useless-ness." This is God's estimate and description of him, even while he exalts himself unto heaven and seeks to be worshipped as God—"that leaveth (or 'forsaketh') the flock"—and thus proves himself a false shepherd and hireling, "the sword shall be upon his arm and his right eye."

The arm is the emblem of might and the eye of intelligence—the two things in which the one who will sum up in himself anti-Christian world-power will trust, and in which he will boast himself. Very well, he shall be smitten in these very parts—"his arm (the emblem of strength) shall be utterly withered up, and his right eye (the symbol and instrument of intelligence) shall be utterly darkened." And this shall be the end of him who shall be slain with the breath of Messiah's mouth, and be destroyed by the brightness of His appearing.

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What is the significance of the thirty pieces of silver in Zechariah 11:12-13?

Compare the evil shepherd in Zechariah 11:15-17 with references to the Antichrist in other portions of scripture.

John 10:12 Rev. 13:3,14

Zechariah 12:1-14

In commencing my notes on the last section of Zechariah (ch. 12-14), I take the liberty of repeating a brief paragraph from my introductory remarks to the 9th chapter to which I would again draw the attention of the reader.

The overthrow of world power, and the establishment of Messiah's Kingdom, may be given as the epitome of the last six chapters of Zechariah. The two oracles which make up the whole of the second half of the book (chs. 9-11 and 12-14) show by their headings, as well as by their contents, and even by their formal arrangement, that they are corresponding portions of a greater whole. Both sections treat of war between the heathen world and Israel, though in different ways.

In the first (chs. 9-11), the judgment through which Gentile world power over Israel is finally destroyed, and Israel is endowed with strength to overcome all their enemies, forms the fundamental thought and center of gravity of the prophetic description. In the second (chs. 12-14), the judgment through which Israel itself is sifted and purged in the final great conflict with the nations, and transformed into the holy nation of Jehovah, forms the leading topic.

The foreground, or more immediate future of the first main section of the second half of the book (chs. 9-11), were, as shown in my notes on those chapters, the victories of Alexander the Great, the overthrow of the Persian Empire, the advent of the Messiah, and His rejection by Israel—though even there, as we had occasion to observe more particularly in connection with ch. 9:9, 10, and ch. 10:4-12, the foreground of the more immediate or proximate future, and the events which were to precede and accompany the First Advent, merge into the great and solemn events of the Second Advent, and the time of the end.

The second or last section, on the other hand (chs. 12-14), seems to me to carry our thoughts altogether to the more distant future, and is eschatological and apocalyptic in its character, for it is impossible to apply the solemn predictions in these chapters to events at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, which is the favorite theory of those who assign a pre-exilic origin for the second half of Zechariah, and who degrade this great prophecy to the level of a mere "political divination of the affairs of the kingdom of Judah in which ardent hopes were expressed by the unknown prophet—hopes destined, however, to be sadly disappointed—respecting the final result of the struggle of the Jewish kingdom with the Babylonian power."

Neither can we, without doing great violence to the prophecy, interpret it of the taking of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes, as some do, nor to the destruction of the city and Temple by the Romans; for (to quote from words of my own) in none of those calamitous events in the past history of Israel did God in the person of the Messiah visibly appear on the Mount of Olives with His angelic hosts as the Deliverer of His people and the destroyer of many nations which were gathered against them; nor was the spirit of grace and supplication ever yet poured out upon the Jewish nation, so that they might look upon and recognize "Him whom they have pierced"; nor has the Lord, from any of those past events onward, become "King over the whole earth" (ch. 14:9); not to mention many other great and solemn events which are predicted in these chapters which cannot be allegorized or explained away. We must reject, therefore, the view of some of the "orthodox" commentators that this last section traverses the ground already trodden in the previous chapters, and "refers to the events which took place in the period between the time of the prophet and the day of the Messiah."

The yom ha'hu, the "that day" which is mentioned no less than fourteen times in these last three chapters, is indeed "the day of the Messiah," but it is the day not of His first advent in humiliation, but of His manifestation in glory. It is, therefore, pre-eminently called yom la-Yehovah—a day for Jehovah—the day set apart and appointed by Him not only for the display of His majesty and vindication of the holiness and righteousness of His character and ways, but it is "the day" of the manifestation of His Divine might and glory in the destruction of Israel's enemies, and the salvation of His own people.

The main theme of the first nine verses of ch. 12 is Israel's sudden deliverance by the interposition of God and the destruction of the armies of the confederated anti-Christian world powers in the final siege of Jerusalem. But inasmuch as this siege, or "straitness," and the solemn events of "that day" synchronize with "the time of Jacob's trouble," and covers the period of unparalleled sufferings and "tribulation" by means of which the Jewish nation is itself first purged as in a fiery furnace, the prophecy properly begins with the words massa debhar Yehovah al Israel—"the burden of the word of Jehovah upon (or 'over') Israel"; the word massa, as we have seen, when dealing with the 1st verse of ch. 9, being as a heading confined entirely to prophecies which contain threatenings and announce judgments.

But though it will be a time of unspeakable anguish for Israel, the climax of all their sufferings and tribulations through all the centuries since the commencement of "the times of the Gentiles," they "shall be saved out of it." Yea, in their greatest extremity, and in the time of their most dire need, God Himself in the person of their Messiah shall interpose on their behalf, and He will be "jealous for His land, and have pity on His people," or, in the words of the inspired prophetic song which Moses was commanded to teach the children of Israel, so that it "should not be forgotten out of the mouth of their seed," and which sets forth in advance all the vicissitudes of their history to the very end—

*"Jehovah shall judge His people,
And repent Himself for His servants:
When He sees that their strength is gone,
And that there is none remaining, shut up or left."*

Then He will "lift up His hand to heaven" and swear, saying:

*"As I live forever.
If I whet my glittering sword, and Mine hand take hold on judgment;
I will render vengeance to Mine adversaries,
And will recompense them that hate Me. "
/ will make Mine arrows drunk with blood,
And My sword shall devour much flesh."*

For the enemies of His people will then be accounted as His enemies, which in reality they are.
But to return to our chapter.

To remove all possibility of doubt of the fulfilment of the great and wonderful things which the prophet is about to announce from the mouth of Jehovah, we are reminded of the almighty-creative and sustaining power of the everlasting God. This surely is a sufficient basis for our faith in His word, however great the human improbabilities and natural impossibilities of their ever being literally fulfilled, may appear to us.

"Thus saith (or 'the saying' of) Jehovah, which stretcheth forth the heavens, and layeth the foundation of the earth, and formeth the spirit of man within him"

A similar declaration of God's almighty-creative and sustaining power is made in Isa. 42:5, and with the same purpose, namely, to remove all doubt as to the realization of the great and mighty things which the prophet there predicts: "Thus saith God, Jehovah, He that createth the heavens, and stretcheth them forth; He that spread abroad the earth, and that which cometh out of it; He that giveth breath (neshamah—soul) unto the people upon it; and spirit (ruach) to them that walk therein."

The participial verbs in our passage in Zech. 12.—noteh, yosed, yotzer—"stretcheth," "layeth" (literally, foundeth), and "formeth"—are intended to remind us of God's omnipotence and the continuous active display of His power and wisdom in the universe which He has created.

Jehovah is altogether a different being from the god of the deist. He not only once for all "in the beginning" created the heavens and the earth, and appointed certain "laws" to regulate their motions, without troubling Himself further about them, or about man, who is admittedly the goal and climax of His creative work on earth. No. "My Father worketh hitherto," said our Lord Jesus, "and I work"; and this is equally true in the sphere of creation, providence, and redemption. According to the Biblical view, as a Bible scholar well observes, "God stretches out the heavens every day afresh, and every day He lays the foundation of the earth, which, if His power did not uphold it, would move from its orbit and fall into ruin." In like manner, when it is said that "He formeth the spirit of man within him," it does not refer merely "to the creation of the spirits or souls of men once for all, but denotes the continuous creative formation and guidance of the human spirit by the Spirit of God."

Now let us hear what Jehovah, the Author of all being and all life, the Creator of heaven and earth, proceeds to say, and be assured, without any shadow of doubt, that what He hath spoken He will in His appointed time bring to pass: "Behold, I (which is very emphatic) will make Jerusalem a goblet (or 'basin') of reeling (or 'giddiness') unto all the peoples round about."

The cup of reeling, or giddiness, is frequently used in Scripture as a symbol of the judgment of God which brings man into a condition of helplessness and misery like unto that of the staggering, intoxicated man who is unable to stand, or walk. "For in the hand of Jehovah," we read in the Psalms, "is a cup, and the wine is red (or 'foameth'); it is full of mixture, and He poureth out of the same; surely the dregs thereof, the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them."

In Isa. 51:21-23 the figure is used of the judgments which Israel itself first experiences: "Therefore hear now this, thou afflicted, and drunken, but not with wine: thus saith thy Lord the Lord, and thy God that pleadeth the cause of His people, Behold, I have taken out of thine hand the cup of staggering (or 'reeling'), even the bowl of the cup of My fury; thou shalt no more drink it again: and I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee; which have said to thy soul, bow down, that we may go over: and thou hast laid thy back as the ground, and as the street to them that go over."

In those passages, however, it is the kos (cup), which is spoken of, but here in Zech. 12 it is the saph, the bowl, or "basin of reeling"; the thought expressed in this instance is that of a vessel large enough for all nations to drink out of it, "either together, or one after another in succession." And they shall all drink of this intoxicating cup of God's judgment and stagger and fall, not to rise again.

The structure of the second half of the verse presents some difficulty, and has been variously rendered and interpreted by commentators. Literally, the clause in Hebrew reads, "And also upon Judah shall be in the siege against Jerusalem."

The question is, What subject must be supplied to the verb "shall be"? Ewald and others have rendered it thus: "And also upon Judah shall it be (incumbent to be occupied) in the siege against Jerusalem." Similarly, already the Targum, Kimchi, Jerome, and many of the modern commentators have explained the passage as "containing a prediction that the people of Judah should be arrayed among the hostile forces marshalled against Jerusalem, that they should be forced to assume such a position by reason of the enemies round about, but that after a certain time the people should be able to break away from the ranks of the hostile army, and would ultimately assist the beleaguered citizens of Jerusalem."

I cannot enter on a minute examination of the critical grounds on which this view has been advocated, but I believe the explanation to be an erroneous one. It is asserted that it is to be inferred from the context that Judah is regarded as in the camp of the enemy, but I agree with Keil, who truly observes that in what follows—

"There is no indication whatever of Judah's having made common cause with the enemy against Jerusalem; on the contrary, Judah and Jerusalem stand together in opposition to the nations, and the princes of Judah have strength in the inhabitants of Jerusalem (v. 5), and destroy the enemy to save Jerusalem (v. 6). Moreover, it is only by a false interpretation that any one can find a conflict between Judah and Jerusalem indicated in ch. 14:14. And throughout it is incorrect to designate the attitude of Judah towards Jerusalem in these verses as 'opposition,' a notion upon which Ebrard (Offenb. Joh) and Kliefoth have founded the marvellous view, that by Jerusalem with its inhabitants and the house of David we are to understand the unbelieving portion of Israel; and by Judah with its princes, Christendom, or the true people of God, formed of believing Israelites and increased by believing Gentiles. Judah is not opposed to Jerusalem, but simply distinguished from it, just as the Jewish kingdom or people is frequently designated by the prophets as Jerusalem and Judah. The gam, which does not separate, but adds, is of itself inapplicable to the idea of opposition. Consequently, we should expect the words 'also upon Judah' express the thought that Judah will be visited with the same fate as Jerusalem—as Luther, Calvin, and many others follow the Peshito in supposing that they do."

The best rendering of the clause in my view is that suggested by a Hebrew student, namely: "And also on Judah shall be (or, fall, this reeling) in (or 'during') the siege (which, is to take place) against Jerusalem"—the sense being that already expressed by Keil, that Judah, which stands here for all the rest of the people of the land, shall experience the same ordeal of suffering in that siege as the inhabitants of Jerusalem, ere the Lord finally interferes on their behalf as the destroyer of their enemies.

The prediction of judgment against the nations who will be gathered against Jerusalem "in that day," is strengthened in the 3rd verse by the use of another figure: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone (lit., a stone for lifting) for all the peoples; all that burden themselves with it (lit., all that lift it) shall be sore wounded (or 'lacerated,' or 'tear rents for themselves'); and all the nations of the earth shall be gathered together against it."

It has been pointed out that there is a gradation in the thought, both in the figure of the "burdensome stone," which cuts and wounds those who try to lift it, whilst the "reeling cup" in the 2nd verse only makes powerless; and also in the description given of the hosts gathered for the attack. In the 2nd verse the nations round about Jerusalem are spoken of, but in the 3rd verse it is "all peoples" and "all nations of the earth."

The magnitude of the danger and of the sufferings of Jerusalem are brought before our minds in the last clause of the 3rd verse, and are to be inferred from the fact that "all nations of the earth," represented, no doubt, by the flower of their armies, "will be gathered against it."

"The gathering of these hosts is not unfrequently referred to in the Scripture, and always in language calculated to impress the mind with the peculiar magnitude of the power to be displayed in this last great effort of man under Satan. In the Revelation, for example (ch. 16:14), it is said that 'spirits of devils,' working miracles, shall go forth to gather the kings of the whole world to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." Joel also speaks of the same mighty confederation: "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles, prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near, let them come up; beat your ploughshares into swords and your pruning-hooks into spears; let the weak say, I am strong. Assemble yourselves, and come, all ye Gentiles, and gather yourselves together round about" (Joel 3:9-12).

But the extremity of Israel's need, as already stated, will be God's opportunity for the display of His power in the destruction of their enemies, and His grace in their deliverance, It is to "that day" that the prophetic words in Ps. 118 refer:

*"Out of my distress I called upon Jehovah;
Jehovah answered me and let me in a large place.
Jehovah is on my side; I will not fear:
What can man do unto me?"*

*All nations compassed me about:
In the Name of the Lord I will cut them off.
They compassed me about; yea, they compassed me about:
In the Name of the Lord I will cut them off.
They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched
as the fire of thorns:
In the Name of the Lord I will cut them off"*

The manner of God's interposition on Israel's behalf is described in the verses which follow: "In that day, saith Jehovah, will I smite every horse with astonishment (lit, with 'bewilderment' or 'stupefaction'), and his rider with madness: and upon the house of Judah will I open Mine eyes, and every horse of the peoples (i.e., of their attacking cavalry) will I smite with blindness."

It is interesting to note that the three nouns timmahon, "astonishment" or "bewilderment"; shigga'on, "madness"; and ivvaron, "blindness," which here describe God's judgment on the confederated armies of the anti-Christian world-powers which will be gathered against Jerusalem, are used elsewhere only of the judgment which was to come upon Israel in case of their apostasy. In the 2nd verse the prophet uses the symbol of the cup, or goblet, of reeling, which, as we have seen, had also been used in the first instance of Israel. Among the other plagues which Israel has had long to drink out of that "cup" are those enumerated in Deut. 28:28: "Jehovah shall smite thee with madness, and with blindness, and with astonishment, or bewilderment." But when Zion's warfare shall be accomplished and her iniquity pardoned, and God's time to favor Zion comes, He says: "I will take out of thine hand the cup of reeling, even the bowl of the cup of My fury: thou shalt no more drink-again, and I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee" and they shall drink to the dregs these very plagues.

The effect of the enemies of Israel being smitten with these three plagues has been thus described: "The terrified horses of the cavalry of the assembled hosts being thus suddenly smitten with bewilderment, or terror, are represented as unable any longer to be guided by bit and bridle. The riders in their madness are described as unable to manage their steeds, while the steeds themselves are portrayed as struck with blindness (or 'blind staggers'), and therefore unable to escape from the dangers around them. And while the enemies of God's people will find themselves in such straits at the very moment when they imagined that they had gained the victory, and while, instead of chasing the vanquished Jews in headlong flight, they themselves are described as rushing upon destruction, Jehovah will 'open His eyes upon the house of Judah' which stands here for the whole covenant nation."

And that look of Jehovah, through the eyes of their Messiah Jesus, upon His long unbelieving and rebellious people—a look of love and pity, not unmixed with tender reproach—will have something of the same effect on stubborn Israel as the look of the Lord Jesus on Peter from the hall of Caiaphas the high priest, when that apostle had thrice denied Him. It will at last soften and melt their hard heart to true repentance, and cause them to "weep bitterly." But this is set forth fully in the last part of this chapter, and for the present we must return to the prophet's description of their outward deliverance and the destruction of their enemies.

While terror and confusion seize the ranks of the assembled hosts as the result of the plagues with which they shall be smitten, unity, confidence, and assurance of victory take possession of the "heart" of the reduced, and till then demoralized, remnant of Judah, from the moment that they become conscious that the eye of Jehovah is upon them for good, and that the "Captain of the Lord's host" Himself is with them: "And the governors (or 'princes') of Judah shall say in their hearts, The inhabitants of Jerusalem are my strength (or, 'a strength to me') in Jehovah of hosts their God."

"The princes of Judah," as Keil truly observes, "recognise in the inhabitants of Jerusalem their strength or might—not in the sense that Judah, being crowded together before Jerusalem, expects help against the foe from the strength of the city and the assistance of its inhabitants, as Hoffmann and Koehler maintain, for 'their whole account of the inhabitants of the land being shut up in the city' (or crowded together before the walls of Jerusalem, and covered by them) is a pure invention, and has no foundation in the text—but in this sense, that the inhabitants of Jerusalem are strong through Jehovah their God, i.e., through the fact that Jehovah has chosen Jerusalem, and by virtue of this election will save the city of His sanctuary" (comp. 10:12 with 3:2, 1:17, 2:16).

It is the fact that Jehovah hath chosen Jerusalem, and has returned to her with mercies, which makes the princes of Judah confident in her invincibility. "God is in the midst of her," sings the Psalmist, looking on to the solemn events of "that day" in the spirit of prophecy—"she shall not be moved; God shall help her" (lit., "at the dawn of the morning," (Ps.46:5) i.e., after the long night of sorrow and weeping.

A slight alteration in the original text of this verse has been suggested already in the Targum, which would read: "The princes of Judah shall say in their heart, The strength of the inhabitants of Judah is in Jehovah their God." But the "correction" is not needed, for this is not the only instance, even in Zechariah, where a collective body is represented as speaking in the singular as one man. Thus, the inhabitants of Bethel speak to the prophet through the deputation which they sent to him (ch. 7:1-5), saying, "Should I weep, etc.?" The singular pronoun, li ("my," or, "to me") is meant to express the fact that each individual says, "in their heart" (which is also in the singular), because all are as one in this confidence that there is strength for them in Jehovah their God, whose power is now displayed on behalf of Jerusalem. "And in that day" the prophecy proceeds, "will I make the princes of Judah as a pan (or 'basin') of fire among wood, and like a torch of fire among sheaves, and they shall devour all the people round about on the right hand and on the left, and Jerusalem shall yet again dwell in her own place in Jerusalem" (tachteah, lit., "under her place" i.e., "in her place")—the name "Jerusalem" in this last clause standing in the first instance for the people personified as a woman, and in the second for the city as such.

That this great deliverance will be all of grace and by the power of God is brought out in the verses which follow: "And Jehovah shall save the tents of Judah first, that the glory of the house of David, and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, be not magnified against Judah."

The reason that "Judah" (which stands here for the people of the land generally in contrast to those who are within the city of Jerusalem) are saved "first," is not, as is mistakenly supposed by some, because Judah, having, though unwillingly, joined the foe in the siege, "will be found in a place more rebellious and more evil than that of Jerusalem," but because of their weak and defenceless condition (as indicated by the fact that they dwell in "tents") as contrasted with those within the city walls. Or, in the words of another, "The defenseless land will be delivered sooner than the well-defended capital, that the latter may not lift itself up above the former, but that both may humbly acknowledge (as Jerome expresses it) that the victory is the Lord's," and that both alike may magnify the grace of God in their deliverance. "The glory (or 'splendor,' tiphereth) of the house of David" consists in the fact that it is the God-appointed royal line in Israel, which was continued in Zerubbabel, the prince who was Zechariah's contemporary, and culminated in our Lord Jesus, the true Son and Heir of David; and "the glory" or "splendor" of the inhabitants of Jerusalem may be regarded as consisting in the fact that they may consider themselves as especially privileged and exalted above the rest of the people of the land as dwellers in the city which God has especially chosen as the seat of His earthly throne. But the deliverance of the defenseless people of the land will be only the "first" act of God's interposition on behalf of Israel in that day.

The heart of the great conflict will be in and around the walls of Jerusalem, for on it all the fury of the enemy's attack will be directed. But "in that day shall Jehovah defend (lit., 'shield') the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and he that is feeble among them shall be as David; and the house of David shall be as God, as the Angel of Jehovah before them." Not its walls or bulwarks will constitute the "defence" of the remnant of the people which shall be left in Jerusalem in that solemn day. From chapters 13:8,9 and 14:1-6, which, as we shall see, refer to the same invasion of the land and siege of Jerusalem by the Gentile hosts, we learn that the city, or a great part of it, will actually be "taken" and spoiled, and half of the city (that is, of the population) "go forth into captivity," and that then, when the enemy lifts his hand for the last blow in order utterly to destroy them, "that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance"—the visible appearance of Jehovah in the person of their Messiah Jesus takes place. The uplifted arm of the adversary becomes suddenly withered; and because Jehovah intervenes as the shield of the remnant that remains, therefore "the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city" (14:2). "For thus saith the Lord unto me, Like as when the lion growleth, and the young lion over his prey, if a multitude of shepherds be called forth against him, he will not be dismayed at their voice, nor abase himself for the noise of them: so shall the Lord of hosts come down to fight upon Mount Zion, and upon the hill thereof. As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts protect Jerusalem; He will protect and deliver it; He will pass over and preserve it."

And not only shall Jehovah Himself "go forth and fight against those nations," but when once the weak and broken remnant of the people recognize their Divine Savior, and hear the shout of the King in their midst, they are suddenly girt with superhuman strength. The feeblest of them, hannikhshal (lit, "he that stumbleth," i.e., the one so weak that he could not even stand, much less fight), shall in that day be as David—the greatest of Israel's national heroes, and "to the Jew, therefore, the highest type of strength and glory on earth"—and the house of David shall be as Elohim (i.e., "God" in His might and majesty), and as the Divine "Angel of Jehovah," who of old went "before them" in the desert and through the Red Sea smiting down their enemies, and therefore, "the highest type of strength and glory in heaven."

No wonder, therefore, that through Him they "will push down their adversaries," and "through His Name tread them under that had risen up against them"; and, if I may venture a brief digression, I would say that there is a message in this scripture for you too, dear Christian reader. It is this, that however weak in yourself and ready to "stumble," you may be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, and that "more" and "greater" is He that is for us, and with us, than all that can be against us. "Through God" exclaims the Psalmist, "we shall do valiantly" (or, as it might be rendered, "in God we shall form an host"—however weak and few and insignificant in ourselves), for He it is that shall tread down our adversaries. But to return to our chapter. While Jehovah endows the inhabitants of Jerusalem with supernatural strength so that they perform exploits, He will "seek to destroy all nations that come against Jerusalem" (i.e., in martial array to attack, as the phrase in the original implies). The expression "seek to do" is always used in the Bible "of seeking to do what it is a person's set purpose to do if he can." Man may seek to do a thing and fail, but "woe indeed to those whom Almighty God shall seek to destroy"; for that on which His heart is once set He will assuredly accomplish, whether it will be in blessing on His people or in vengeance on His enemies.

The Great Spiritual Crisis in Israel's History

The first nine verses of the 12th chapter of Zechariah describe prophetically, as we have seen, Israel's great national deliverance and the destruction of the armies of the confederated anti-Christian world powers which shall be gathered in the final siege of Jerusalem. That will, indeed, be a great and wonderful day in their history, "an hour of triumph such as they have never known before, greater than when they quitted Egypt; greater than when they triumphed over Pharaoh and his host at the Red Sea; greater than when they entered the Promised Land, and the walls of Jericho fell down before them."

But yet there is something greater, more solemn and more blessed, than mere outward deliverance and triumph over their enemies that Israel is to experience on "that day," and that is God's final conquest over them. Ah! yes, Israel shall then learn the truth of the saying, that "our only true triumphs are God's triumphs over us, that His defeats of us are our only true victories"; and will learn with the great apostle—whose history and experiences are in many ways a foreshadowing of the history and experience of his nation—to say, "Thanks be unto God, who always leadeth us in triumph in Christ"—that is, as former enemies who have been vanquished, and whom He is now leading about as manifest trophies of His all-subduing grace and power.

"On former occasions, when Jeshurun had been made to ride on the high places of the earth, he had waxed fat and kicked; then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation. But it will never be so again. He who comes to conquer their foes comes also to subdue their hearts." Hence, great as their triumph will be, great as will have been their individual might in the last stage of their conflict with the surrounding hosts (so that "he that is feeble among them will be as David"), yet, when they return from their victory, this their glorious day of triumph will end in self-abasement and tears. How this wonderful change will be brought about, how the stubborn heart of unbelieving and gainsaying Israel will at last be broken, we are told in the 10th verse: "And I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and supplication; and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced; and they shall mourn for Him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for Him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born".

"I think," said a great master in Israel, "there is nothing in the whole range of scripture more touching than the promise contained in these simple, unadorned words. As they touch the heart they fix themselves on our memory. Who can ever forget them? 'They shall look unto (or "upon") Me whom they have pierced.'"

"And I will pour"—v'sha-phachti—the word expresses the fulness and abundance of the gift of the Spirit which shall then be bestowed upon the people. The promise points back to Joel 2:28, 29: "And it shall come to pass afterward that I will pour out My spirit upon all flesh" etc.; or, as we read in Isaiah: "I will pour My spirit upon thy seed, and My blessing upon thine offspring"—in the same abundance and with the same blessed quickening and fertilizing effects as "waters" and "streams" are poured "upon the dry and thirsty ground."

"Upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem." Jerusalem and its inhabitants are mentioned alone in the text, "not as though the blessing of the gracious outpouring of the spirit was to be confined to them, but because Jerusalem is used as a designation for the whole people, in accord with the custom of regarding the capital as the representative of the whole nation"; for it is clear enough from the whole context that, if the great penitential sorrow which is to be the fruit of this outpouring commences in Jerusalem as the center, and with "the house of David," which stands for the highest among the people, it extends to "the whole land" (v. 12), and to all "the families of the people."

"The spirit of grace and of supplication"—ruach hen v'tthachnunim—is the Holy Spirit of God who conveys grace and brings our hearts into a condition of grace. Just as "The spirit of wisdom and understanding" is the spirit infusing wisdom and understanding, and "the spirit of counsel and might" is that same spirit imparting the gift of counsel to see what is to be done, and of might to do it, and "the spirit of knowledge, and of the fear of the Lord" is that same spirit infusing intimate acquaintance with God with awe at His infinite majesty; so "the spirit of grace" is that same spirit infusing grace and bringing into a state of favor with God, and a "spirit of supplication" is that spirit calling out of the inmost soul the cry for a yet larger measure of the grace already given. But the simplest way to understand the two kindred terms, hen and thachnunim—"grace and supplication"—is to view them in the light of cause and effect, for grace is that which God bestows and the Holy Spirit conveys, and "supplication" is the fruit of that condition of heart, or soul, which that same spirit creates within us.

The blessed effect of the outpouring of the spirit of grace and supplication on the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem "in that day" will be that "they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and mourn."

(a) They shall look (v'hibitu) with no ordinary or mere passing look, but "with trustful hope and longing," as one has paraphrased it. Among the other meanings which this particular verb has is that of "to regard," "to consider," "to contemplate," "to look upon with pleasure." It is used, for instance, in that remarkable story of the brazen serpent in Num. 21:9, which, as it seems to me, was in the mind of Zechariah when he uttered this prophecy: "And Moses made a serpent of brass, and set it on a pole (or 'the standard'), and it came to pass that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld it (or looked unto— v'hibitu), the serpent of brass, he lived." With this same eager look of faith and hope shall Israel in that day behold and contemplate Him, who is the great antitype of the brazen serpent, and who was "lifted up" for us on the Cross, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish but have everlasting life. It is this word also which is used in Num. 12:8, as describing the beatific view of the very "form" or "similitude" of God, which it was the distinction and privilege of Moses above the other prophets to "behold." Thus also, not "in a vision" or "in a dream," but face to face, and with no longer any veil to hide His glory, shall Israel in that day "look upon" Him who came once in humiliation to suffer and die, but who shall be manifested now in the glory of His Father and with His holy angels.

(b) "Unto Me," or "Upon Me" (elai).

This sets forth the character and majesty of Him whom they shall behold as their great Deliverer, for the One who speaks throughout the chapter, as already observed, is none other than Jehovah, "which stretcheth forth the heavens, and layeth the foundation of the earth, and formeth the spirit of man within him" (v. 1); and who in this 10th verse says: "I will pour out the spirit of grace and of supplications." This, as already observed above, is a great mystery comprehensible only to faith based on the Biblical revelation of the twofold nature of the Messiah; but when perceived it is very precious and beautiful.

"They shall look upon Me."

The Jewish nation has hitherto regarded faith in our Lord Jesus as irreconcilable with faith in God, and have conceived of Him as being in opposition to God.

This was the chief ground of the blind hostility to Christ on the part of the scribes and Pharisees during His earthly ministry, and has continued to this day, not knowing that their hatred of Christ was in its essence nothing else than hatred of God, and their opposition to Him nothing else than a fighting against God. But, as Saul of Tarsus (whose experience and history are in many ways a foreshadowment of the history of his people in relation to Christ) was startled and surprised to learn from that voice on his way to Damascus, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutes," that those hated Nazarenes whom he was persecuting, even unto death, were one with Him who was now revealed to him as the risen and living Son of God, and that he who was touching them was touching "the apple of His eye"; so shall the Jewish nation in the day when the spirit of grace and of supplication is poured upon them, and "the eyes of the blind are opened" to behold the divine glory of their Messiah, be startled and surprised to discover that their having persecuted and "pierced" Him was equivalent to their having persecuted and pierced God, because of His being one with God, in a higher and deeper sense even than believers are with Christ.

But just as the words, "they shall look unto Me" set forth the essential oneness of the pierced One with Jehovah, so does the sudden transition in the same verse from the first person to the third, and the words, "they shall mourn for Him" teach us that, as to His person, He is yet distinct from God. The same mystery and apparent paradox meet us in many other Old Testament scriptures which speak of the Messiah as "Jehovah" the "mighty God," and yet as one sent by, and coming in the name of God, and is—a mystery which (as already stated above) is solved to all whose eyes have been opened to the Biblical doctrine of the Tri-unity of the blessed Godhead, and to the twofold nature of the promised Redeemer, who is perfect God and perfect Man—the Son of David and the Son of the Highest.

(c) "Whom they have pierced."

The verb daqar means "to pierce," or "thrust through with a spear or lance," and points to "the climax of our Savior's mortal sufferings" when, as the Gospel narrative bears witness, "one of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side, and straightway there came out blood and water."

It was a Roman soldier who did the actual deed; Roman soldiers also were they who pierced His blessed brow with the crown of thorns, and His hands and feet with those cruel nails; but the guilt and responsibility for these actions will be brought home to the heart and conscience of the Jewish nation in that day, and they will then acknowledge that both directly, by delivering Him into the hands of the Gentiles, and indirectly, on account of their sins, it was they who pierced Him.

(d) "And they shall mourn for (or 'over') Him"—vesaphedhu alav—not only with the ordinary "mourning," as those who mourn for the dead (in which sense the verb saphad, is generally used), but with a deep and intense mourning, namely, "as one that mourneth for his only son" (or, literally, "with the mourning for an only one"), and "they shall be in bitterness for Him as one that is in bitterness for his first-born." Mourning for an "only son" was proverbial as descriptive of the magnitude of the grief, as we read in Jer. 6:26: "O daughter of my people, gird thee with sackcloth, and wallow thyself in ashes: make thee mourning as for an only son, most bitter lamentation." And again in Amos 8:10: "I will make it as the mourning for an only son."

But not only on account of their proverbial use to express the intensity and bitterness of the sorrow and grief, are these names "the only one" and "first-born" introduced here in connection with Israel's mourning over the Messiah whom they had pierced, they are peculiarly appropriate designations of Him who is "the First-born of every creature," and of whom the apostle exclaims: "We beheld His glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father full of grace and truth." And He is not only the "first" and "only-begotten" as the Son of God, in relation to the Father, but as the Son of Man, and more particularly in relation to the Jewish nation. He was their child of promise upon whom the hopes and expectations of the nation had been centered through the centuries. He is the "only One" whom this nationally barren woman, who was betrothed unto Jehovah, had brought forth, as it were, miraculously, by the power of God. And it was ordained that He should be "the First-born among many brethren," first and foremost to them who, according to the flesh, are "His own," as well as in relation to men generally—and Him they have with wicked hands "pierced" and slain! No wonder that "in that day," when the spirit of grace and supplication is poured upon them, and their eyes are open to behold Him, and to recognize the fearful national crime which they committed, to their own sorrow and hurt, they shall mourn over Him "with the mourning for an only one," and shall be in bitterness for Him as he is in bitterness "who mourneth for his first-born."

It is in that day of their deep sorrow and contrition that they shall, amid their broken-hearted sobs, utter that great national confession and lament contained in that wonderful chapter in Isaiah:

"He was despised, and rejected of men; a Man of Sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and as one from whom men hide their face He was despised; and we esteemed Him not. Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem Him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all."

(e) And not only will the mourning be great and intense, it will also be universal and yet individual: "In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon. And the land shall mourn, every family apart; the family of the house of David apart, and their wives apart; the faintly of the house of Nathan apart, and their wives apart; the family of the house of Levi apart, and their wives apart; the family of the Shimeites apart, and their wives apart: all the families that remain, every family apart, and their wives apart."

One or two points in these verses need explanation:

(1) Israel's great penitential mourning over their Messiah is likened by the prophet for magnitude to "the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon."

The reference can be nothing else than to the national mourning over the pious young king Josiah, who was slain by Pharaoh Necho "in the valley of Megiddon," as recorded in 2 Kings 23:29, 30, and more fully in 2 Chron. 35:20-27. His death was the greatest sorrow which had till then befallen Judah, inasmuch as he was "the last hope of the declining Jewish kingdom, and in his death the last gleam of the sunset of Judah faded into night." In that great mourning for Josiah the prophet Jeremiah took part, and wrote dirges for it (2 Chron. 35:25), and the national lamentations over him continued and became "an ordinance" in Israel, which survived the seventy years' captivity and continued "to this day," when the chronicles were closed. It was worthy, therefore, to be referred to by the prophet, and to be compared with the still greater and more bitter mourning of repentant Israel in the future.

(2) In the universal, yet individual, mourning which, commencing in Jerusalem, will spread throughout the whole land, four "families" are especially singled out as being conspicuous. Of these four, two are well known, namely, "the family of the house of David" and "the family of the house of Levi." But who are meant by "the family of the house of Nathan" and "the family of Shimei" (or of "the Shimeites")?

It would require a treatise to analyse the various conjectures and explanations which have been advanced on this point by Jewish and Christian commentators.

Let me in the briefest possible manner give here what seems to me the most satisfactory explanation. And first, we may say with certainty that "the family of the house of Nathan" does not refer to the posterity of Nathan the prophet, as representing the prophetic order, as the Rabbis and some Christian writers have supposed, but to the family of Nathan, the son of David and brother of Solomon (2 Sam. 5:14), whose name figures also in the genealogy of our Lord in Luke 3:31. Likewise, "the family of the Shimeite" does not refer to the tribe of Simeon, which, according to rabbinic fiction, furnished the teachers of the nation; for in that case, apart from other considerations, the name would be differently written in the Hebrew, but refers to Shimei, the son of Gershon and grandson of Levi (Num. 3:18). We have thus two families of the royal and two of the priestly line, and of these one stands for the chief (David for the royal, and Levi for the priestly), and the other (Nathan for the royal, and Shimei for the priestly), for the subordinate families of their lines—as including and representing the whole—to indicate, as Hengstenberg suggests, that the mourning spoken of would pervade every family (of these lines) from the highest to the lowest.

But though these, as the two aristocratic and privileged lines, the rulers and priests, who, alas! in times past often set an evil example to the whole nation, will now be foremost in their self-contrition and mourning over the great national sin, their example for good will now also be followed by all the rest of the people. This is expressed in the last verse of the chapter, which tells us that "all the families that remain shall mourn, every family apart, and their wives apart."

In the last sentence of the chapter, not only the magnitude and universality, but the depth and intensity, as well as the individual character of this unprecedented mourning, is once again described. It is strikingly pictured as a mourning which shall not only be manifested in public, but be participated in by each family apart. And not only are families spoken of as mourning apart from families, but individuals, compelled by the deep sorrow which shall overwhelm them, shall weep apart by themselves.

This depicts a sorrow greater than any previous sorrow. Even husbands shall mourn apart from their wives, and wives apart from their husbands, because each individual man or woman will be overwhelmed with his or her own individual share in the guilt of having slain their Messiah,

It will thus be both a national and individual mourning at the same time, and no mere ceremonial lamentation, but a genuine sorrow of heart. "Each individual shall experience the grief so keenly as to desire to hide himself from the eyes of others"—even from those nearest to them.

The only one who will be able effectually to comfort them in this great mourning will be the Lord Himself, He over whom they shall mourn. And He shall comfort them in that day as "him whom his mother comforteth," and they "shall be comforted in Jerusalem."

When once this great but godly sorrow shall have accomplished its blessed end in working a repentance never to be repented of, He shall pour His consolations into their broken hearts, and give unto them the "oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Like Joseph to his brethren (in whom the history of Christ and Israel is depicted), He will say unto them: "As for you, ye thought evil against me, but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive: now, therefore, be not grieved nor angry with yourselves."

We are done with the exposition of this great Messianic prediction. The ultimate literal fulfilment of it lies yet in the future, in the day for which we watch and pray, when our Lord Jesus shall, according to His promise, appear in His glory, and the Jewish nation shall literally look upon Him whom they have pierced, and be, as it were, "born in a day." But there is a forestalment, so to say, in the fulfilment of this prophecy in the case of the individual even now, "And thus," to quote the words of an honored Hebrew Christian brother and true master of Israel, "every Jew who, by the grace of God since the Day of Pentecost, has been brought to Christ, fulfils this prediction; he looks unto Him whom he has pierced. It is the look of repentance; for only a sight of the crucified Jesus shows us our sin and grief. It is the look of supplication and faith; for He only can bless and save, and He saves all who believe. It is the look of peace and adoration; for His love is infinite, unchanging, and omnipotent. It is the look which never ceases and never ends; for now the veil is taken away, and we with open face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory."

And as it is with the individual Jew, so it is with the individual Gentile. Yes, thanks be to God, as we all, whether Jew or Gentile, had our share in the guilt of Christ's crucifixion because of our common sin, so also may all have their share in the salvation which comes through a penitent look of faith on Him whom we have pierced.

The Cross has been from the beginning, and must continue to be, the center of all true Christian devotion, "the security against passion, the impulse to self-denial, the parent of zeal for souls, the incentive to love. This has struck the rock, that it gushed forth in tears of penitence; this, the strength and vigor of hatred of sin—to look to Him whom our sins have pierced."

Let us all then look to Him for our salvation, and have our gaze fixed upon Him for our sanctification, and so have no occasion to dread that awful day when "He cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see Him, and they which pierced Him: and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him. Even so, Amen" (Rev. 1:7).

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

In the day of the Israel's repentance, what will cause them the greatest grief?

Zechariah 13:1-6

The first six verses of the 13th chapter stand in closest connection with the great prophecy in the 12th chapter.

There the prophet depicts in the last verses the great national repentance and sorrow of Israel over Him "whom they have pierced," as the result of the pouring out upon them of the spirit of grace and supplication. Here we see how that same blessed Spirit, who shall have wrought in them this godly penitential sorrow on account of their great national sin, shall also bring them into the experience of forgiveness, and open their eyes to the provision God has made for their justification and cleansing.

"In that day"—the goal of prophetic vision in relation to the nation, the great "day" of Israel's national atonement—when "the iniquity of that land shall be removed in one day," and when a whole nation shall, as it were, "be born at once," "shall a fountain be opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness."

The word employed here for "fountain" is maqor, which, according to its etymological meaning, describes a place "dug" out, and perhaps originally standing for "well," or artificially made "cistern," came to mean spring or fountain. It is the substantive used in Ps. 36:9: "For with Thee is the fountain of life"; and in Jer. 2:13 and 17:13 it is used as the figure of Jehovah Himself, "the Fountain of living waters."

Here in Zech. 13, however, it is not primarily as the source of life and refreshment, but as the means of purification from sin and moral uncleanness, that the figure of the fountain is introduced.

The background of the figurative language in this prophetic scripture are the Divine appointments in the Levitical ritual. The primary allusion may be to the water used for the purification of the Levites on their consecration, which is called mei hattath, literally, "sin water" or "water of expiation."

It is this Levitical ordinance which was very probably also in the mind of the priestly prophet Ezekiel in his great prophecy concerning Israel's future in ch. 36: "And I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you."

In our passage in Zechariah, however, the figure is a much stronger one. Instead of water being sprinkled upon the defiled, a fountain of cleansing water is opened, in which the guilty may wash and be clean. But the words le-hattath u-leriddah—"for sin and for uncleanness"—seem almost an echo of Num. 19:9, where these two words are used. The ashes of the red heifer, we read, shall be laid up in a clean place without the camp, "lemai niddah, hattath hi" literally, "for water of purification, a means of removing sin it is."

The Revised Version renders the words "a water of separation; it is a sin offering." The fact is that hattath means "sin," and also "offering for sin," or "means of removing sin." The same is true of the word niddah, translated "uncleanness" in Zech. 13:1,2, and "separation" in the Authorized and Revised Versions in Num. 19:9, which means primarily that kind of ceremonial uncleanness which requires "separation," but denotes also the means of the removal of this particular uncleanness.

But, to repeat, it is not for the purification from bodily, or ceremonial uncleanness, that the fountain shall then be opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem—which in this passage also, as in ch. 12:10, represents the whole nation—but for purification from the guilt and the moral defilement of sin, of which bodily uncleanness is often used in the Bible as a figure. Thus, for instance, in Ps. 51:7 David prays: "Purge me (literally, if one may invent an expression, 'unsin me' or 'rid me of my sin') with hyssop"—which is a distinct allusion to the cleansing of the leper from his bodily plague, in connection with which a Jewish commentator rightly observes: "What has befallen the soul is like unto the plague of leprosy in the body." To pass from the figure to the reality, from the shadow to the substance, the "fountain" which shall then be opened to the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem for the national and individual cleansing from guilt and sin, is nothing else than the blood of their Messiah whom they have pierced. Hence, those are not far wrong who trace a connection between maqor ("fountain") in ch. 13:1 and daqar ("pierced") in ch. 12:10, and say that the opening of the fountain took place when the Roman soldier with his spear pierced our Savior's side, and "there came out of it blood and water"—though the basis for the connection is not in philology (the root of the two words not being the same though of cognate significance), but in fact.

Yes, Israel "in that day" shall experience the wonderful and everlasting efficacy of the blood of Jesus their Messiah, God's Son, which cleanseth from all sin. In quite another and blessed sense shall that fearful prayer once uttered in ignorance, "His blood be on us and our children," which has haunted the Jewish conscience through all the centuries since, and has, like the blood of Abel, brought down the curse of Cain on the whole nation, be fulfilled "in that day." It shall be upon them for life and not for death, for cleansing and not for defilement.

They shall experience then the truth of the inspired words in Heb. 9:13, that "if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge our conscience from dead works to serve the living God."

But, it may be objected, if it is the blood of Christ which constitutes the cleansing stream which shall wash away Israel's "sins and uncleanness," then the fountain was "opened" nineteen centuries ago on Calvary; whereas this is a prophecy of the national purification of Israel which is to take place "in that day" which is yet future.

For answer, I repeat what I stated in my notes on ch. 3:9: "I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day"—namely, that what is here predicted will assuredly be fulfilled only on the ground and as a blessed consequence of "the day of Golgotha," when Christ, through the eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot unto God; but actually and experimentally the great "day" of Israel's national repentance and of cleansing will take place when the spirit of grace and of supplications shall be poured out upon them, and they shall look upon Him whom they have pierced. The cleansing fountain for sin and for uncleanness was opened once and for all when "the Lamb of God" was slain and His precious blood shed; but to the sinner actually and experimentally the Day of Calvary is the day his eyes are opened to the true meaning to himself of the great redeeming work there accomplished, and when the Spirit of God applies Jesus' blood and righteousness and high-priestly intercession to his own need. Thus "in that day" it will be with Israel nationally. The fountain will be opened then "to the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem," because "then the eyes of the blind shall be opened" for the first time to behold the Lamb of God, and to perceive the atoning value and efficacy of the offering which He once made for the sins of many.

Blessed be God! the fountain once opened shall never be closed, for the force of the Hebrew words which are used, is not only "shall be opened," but "shall remain open"—ever free and accessible to all, and everlastingly efficacious for "sin and for uncleanness."

From the inward cleansing of the people from the guilt and moral defilement of sin, the prophet passes in vv. 2-6 to the cleansing of the land and the purification of the environment in which the forgiven and sanctified people shall then live and move. Nothing that defileth shall be permitted in the restored Jewish state in the day when "Jehovah shall inherit Judah, His portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again."

The two chief sources of moral pollution and the great besetting sin of Israel in the land were idolatry and false prophecy. These shall be utterly purged out of their midst. "And it shall come to pass in that day, saith Jehovah of hosts, that I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land, and they shall no more be remembered: and I will also cause the prophets and the unclean spirit to pass out of the land." Not only shall the idols—the objects of idolatrous worship—themselves be "cut off," but their very names and remembrance shall perish in the land; and not only shall false prophets disappear, but the unclean spirit—the author and inspirer of false prophecy as well as the instigator of idolatry—shall be cast out from the midst of the people, whose ears shall then be circumscribed to hearken only to words of truth and purity, and whose heart's love and worship shall be centered in Jehovah alone.

The evil spirit is particularly designated as the ruach hattumah ("the spirit of uncleanness"), in contrast to "the spirit of grace and of supplications" in ch. 12:10, who is pre-eminently the Ruach Ha-qodesh—the "Holy Spirit"—because He is the representative and revealer of the blessed Godhead, whose chief attribute is that of holiness, and who dwells in the midst of His people to sanctify them and to make them holy, because Jehovah their God is holy.

Some have argued from the mention of idols and false prophecy in this passage that these last chapters of Zechariah must have been written in the pre-exilic period when these two great national sins were still prevalent in the land. But there is no real foundation, in fact, for this anymore than for the other "proofs" of a pre-exilic authorship of these chapters, as I have already shown elsewhere. In reference to this particular point, though it be true that idolatry, and false prophecy, which was usually associated with it, did not exist any more in their gross form among the Jewish people after the Babylonian captivity, such passages as Neh. 6:10; Ezra. 9:1; Neh. 13:23, 24, etc., which speak of the lying prophets which existed at that time, and of marriages contracted, even by priests, with Canaanitish and other heathen women, whose children could not even speak the Jewish language—show very clearly, as Keil and others point out, that "the danger of falling back into idolatry was not a remote one."

The range of the prophetic vision, however, in the six last chapters of Zechariah does not terminate with the mere immediate future, but finds its goal in the time of the end, when the great sins of idolatry and false prophecy shall reach their climax in the worship of the beast and his image, and in the "unclean spirits" which shall go forth upon the earth to deceive the anti-Christian nations.

The four verses which follow are an amplification of the announcement in v. 2 that idolatry and false prophecy would be utterly exterminated from the land "in that day." They set forth in realistic—we might almost say dramatic—form the great change which will then come over the Jewish nation, and their zeal against those sins which formerly were the chief causes of their national ruin.

The 3rd verse introduces an hypothetical case: "And it shall come to pass that, when any shall yet prophesy, then his father and his mother that begat him shall say unto him, Thou shalt not live: for thou speakest lies in the Name of the Lord: and his father and his mother that begat him shall thrust him through when he prophesieth"

The allusion is to Deut. 13:6-10, where we read: "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, . . . thine eye shall not pity him; neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him, but thou shalt surely kill him: thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death." The same injunction holds true in relation to the false prophet who either speaks "presumptuously" or falsely in the Name of Jehovah, or in the name of other gods. "That same prophet shall die"

Now the prophet, to illustrate the zeal for Jehovah and His truth which shall then characterize converted and regenerated Israel, supposes such a case. Even if it should be their own son who should presumptuously "prophesy," either to entice them from their allegiance to Jehovah or to spread error in His Name, his own parents will not spare or pity him; but his father and his mother that begat him shall thrust him through (ud'qaruhu—the verb is the same as in ch. 12:10 for "pierced") when he prophesieth (b'hinnabho), which may mean either when he is in the act of prophesying, or, "because of his prophesying." Zeal for Jehovah and His law will be so strong as to overmaster even parental affection; the people themselves would stop short at nothing in order utterly to exterminate the evil should it be possible once again to assert itself.

And not only will false prophets no longer be tolerated in their midst, the pretended prophets themselves will be ashamed of their calling. "And it shall come to pass in that day that the prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision when he prophesieth; neither shall they wear a hairy mantle to deceive." "In former days the false prophets had been bold enough to assert their claims even in the very face of the true prophets raised up by Jehovah. Now, popular feeling will run so strongly in an opposite direction that persons will be ashamed of making any pretence to supernatural visions, and confounded when charged with having made such assumptions. Instead of being anxious to be considered as prophets, they will rather seek in every way to avoid the reputation of such a dangerous and unpopular profession."

The "hairy mantle" was the distinguishing garb of some of the great prophets. Some (as Koehler) suppose it to have been made of untanned skins; others think it was a garment formed of camel's hair, such as that worn by John the Baptist. Thus, Elijah was recognized by Ahaziah when described by his messengers as "a hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins." The "rough garment" was not only the outward sign of "the strict course of life and abstinence from worldly pleasures"—"the frugality alike in food and attire," which marked the true prophets of Jehovah—but, also (on certain great occasions, at any rate), it was the symbol of grief and mourning for the sins of the nation, and the consequent judgments which they were commissioned to announce.

In the case of the false prophets it was a cloak of hypocrisy, and was assumed "in order to lie," or "deceive"; for, though outwardly they may be clothed like "sheep," or even like the true prophets of God, inwardly they are "ravening wolves."

The prophet having shown the opposition which would be exhibited by the Jewish nation to the false prophets, who in the past were the chief cause of their national undoing—first, by the hypothetical instance of a son who should venture to prophecy falsely being slain by his own parents; and secondly, by the general statement that the pretended prophets would themselves be ashamed of their evil profession and seek in every way to avert suspicion that they ever had to do with such evil practices, with a view to deceive the people—proceeds in the next two verses still more fully to illustrate the condition of the time.

In a few but graphic touches he pictures a dramatic incident. One who is suspected of being a false prophet is suddenly challenged by a zealous Israelite. He, however vehemently answers, "I am no prophet"; far from ever having professed to be an inspired teacher of the people, "I am a tiller of the ground (i.e., belonging to the humblest class of the people), and I have been made a bondsman (or, 'a man has bought me') from my youth."

A certain similarity has been pointed out between the words of this false prophet and those of Amos, when in answer to Amaziah, the priest of the idolatrous worship of Bethel, who warned him to flee to Judah and prophesy there, but to cease prophesying in Bethel, because it was the chief sanctuary and a royal residence of the kings of Israel, the prophet said: "I was (or 'am') no prophet, neither was I a prophets son, but I was a herdman, and a dresser of sycomore trees."

But the purport (intention) of the two passages is very different. Here, in our passage in Zechariah, the false prophet, when accused with exercising the functions of a prophet, utterly denies the charge; but Amos, though he disclaims having been a prophet by profession and training, is nevertheless conscious of a direct call from God, and boldly asserts his divine mission in the words which immediately follow: "Jehovah took me from following the flock, and Jehovah said unto me, Go, prophesy unto My people Israel." Far, therefore, from being intimidated by the threats of Amaziah, or his royal master Jeroboam II, he proceeds: "Now therefore hear thou the word of Jehovah."

But to return to the dramatic incident in our passage in Zechariah. Not easily put off by the vehement protestations of the false prophet that he is not at all likely to have performed the functions of a prophet, seeing he is only a simple peasant—in fact, a slave from his youth—his interrogator proceeds: "What are these wounds between thine hands? And he shall say (They are) those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends."

The two clauses in this 6th verse are to be understood as "speech and reply, or question and answer." It was very probably these makkoth—"wounds"—which the zealous challenger of the false prophet had observed which first aroused his suspicion. He evidently regards them as self-inflicted on his person in order to arouse his prophetic frenzy, or in connection with idolatrous rites. "It must not be forgotten," to quote the words of another, "that such rites were sometimes observed even where Jehovah was acknowledged to be the highest object of adoration. In the idolatrous court of Ahab there were hundreds of false prophets who were wont to prophesy in the Name of Jehovah, and yet at the same court priests and prophets of Baal cut themselves with knives and lancets until blood gushed out upon them, in order to procure answers from their god." That such practices were common among Israelites in the days of apostasy is plain from the passage referred to, as well as from the prohibition of similar doings in Deut 14:1, in cases of mourning for the dead, which were employed in later times by the Israelites.

The expression "between thy hands" is an idiom which may mean on the palms of the hands, or on the arms, or on the chest between the hands; but the explanation of Rashi that it means "between thy shoulders," where persons are wont to be scourged, is a very unlikely one. There is difference of opinion among commentators as to the meaning of the answer of the false prophet in the second half of the verse. It greatly depends on the meaning we attach to the word—rendered "of my friends," in the Authorized Version, but which might more properly be translated "my lover." Now Hengstenberg and others understood the "lovers" to signify idols, and regard the answer as a humble confession on the part of the false prophet who is thus detected, either that his wounds were received during some idolatrous rites, or, though self-inflicted, he was only the instrument—the real authors of the wounds being his "lovers," namely, the idols whom he worshipped. But I agree with Koehler, Keil, Dr. Wright, and others, that, though it be true that the special conjugation of this verb (piel) is used in other cases of dishonorable love, and might therefore be figuratively used of idolatry and idols, "there is nothing in the form of the verb to render that meaning necessary. Intensity of love is all that is expressed in the word; and the expression might, as far as the form is concerned, be used with reference to parents or any friends, whether good or bad."

It is very probable, therefore, that far from being a humble confession of his guilt, "this answer is also nothing but an evasion, and that he simply pretends that the marks were scars left by the chastisements which he received when a boy in the house of either loving parents, or some other loving relations or friends."

This seems to me more in accord with the context, and illustrates the general statement that the false prophets would in that day themselves be ashamed of their former evil profession, and when detected would stop short of no falsehood in order to avert or dispel suspicion.

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

What is meant in Zechariah 13:2 by an unclean spirit?

How will those be treated that prophesy falsely?

Zech. 13:3-6

Zechariah 13:7-9

With the 7th verse begins a new section in this last great prophecy (chs. 12-14), which has for its main theme the judgment by means of which Israel will be finally purged and transformed into the holy people of Jehovah. It is in the first instance an expansion and enlargement of what has gone before. But, whereas the preceding section (12:1-13:6) announces how the Lord will protect Israel and Jerusalem against the pressure of the world-powers, how He will smite their enemies, and not only endow His people with miraculous power which ensures their victory, but also by pouring out His spirit of grace and of supplications upon them, lead them to a knowledge of the guilt they have incurred by putting the Messiah to death, and to repentance and renovation of life; the second half (13:7-14:21) depicts the judgment which will fall on Jerusalem itself, by means of which the ungodly shall be cut off, and the righteous remnant and the land itself be purified and made fit to be the center of God's kingdom on the earth.

This second half is divided again into two parts, the former of which (ch. 13:7-9) gives a summary of the contents, while the latter (ch. 14) expands it into fuller detail.

The Exposition

From the false prophet "wounded in the house of his friends," or "lovers," upon whom his attention had been fixed in the verses immediately preceding, the Spirit of God abruptly turns the prophetic gaze of Zechariah on to another and altogether different figure, who is now made to pass before his vision, and whose experience, if not foreshadowed, is at least suggested by the treatment which had been meted out to the false prophet. He was the true prophet, and much more than a prophet, but He also was "wounded," yea, "smitten" even unto death, in the house of His friends (i.e., "His own" nation), who in their blind and ungodly zeal even thought that they rendered God a service in slaying the Prince of Life; because, having become alienated in their hearts from God, they did not recognize Him Who is the very "image of the invisible God," and charged Him with blasphemy, because He claimed to speak to them in the Name of God, as one who is "equal with God."

But this great national crime, which has occasioned them unparalleled sorrow and suffering, was nevertheless overruled of God to the greatest good for the world as a whole, and is the very ground of Israel's future national redemption. The slaying of the Messiah, therefore, which, in ch. 12:10-14, is viewed as being the act of the Jewish nation, of which they shall yet repent with such deep and godly sorrow, is in the passage now before us described as an act of God. "Awake, O sword, against My Shepherd, and against the man that is My Fellow." This aspect of Messiah's sufferings and death, namely, that they were inflicted upon Him by God in order to make His soul "an offering for sin," is set forth more fully in Isa. 53, where we read that "it pleased Jehovah to bruise Him; He hath put Him to grief" etc. It was indeed by the hand of man that "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter"; but, "human malice acting freely" could do no more than what "His hand and His counsel had foreordained to come to pass." Yes, "the envy and hatred of Satan, the blind fury of the chief priests, the contempt of Herod, the guilty cowardice of Pilate, freely accomplished that death which God had before decreed for the salvation of the world."

But let us look more carefully at this remarkable passage: "O sword, awake!" (herebh uri)—the sword being addressed as a person, and called upon to rouse itself, as it were, from sleep in order to execute Divine justice.

But upon whom shall it fall? Not, in this instance, upon the wicked and the ungodly, but, mystery of mysteries! upon Him who is not only absolutely innocent and holy, but who stands in the nearest and closest relationship to Jehovah. This would be the most inexplicable thing in God's moral government of the universe were it not for the wonderful counsel of God in the salvation of man revealed in the Scriptures, according to which the Messiah willingly becomes the Lamb of God in order to save a lost world, and is "wounded (lit., 'pierced through') for our transgressions, bruised (or 'crushed') for our iniquities," and "pours out His soul unto death," in order that sinners might not only be saved from the penalty of their sin, but obtain eternal life.

"Against My Shepherd"—Jehovah Himself is "the Shepherd of Israel," but He fulfils all that is implied in this relationship and office mediately, in and through the Messiah. This is fully set forth in Ezek. 34, where, after announcing that He will Himself "seek" and "save," "heal" and strengthen," "feed" and "satisfy," His now scattered flock, He says: "I will set up one shepherd over them, and He shall feed them, even my servant David" (whom the Jewish commentators themselves identify with the Messiah, "David's greater Son"). "He shall feed them, and He shall be their Shepherd," God, therefore, calls Him "My Shepherd," for He is not only specially called and appointed by Him to this office, but because He is in the fullest sense His Representative, in and through whom the shepherd relationship between God and His people is realized.

The Shepherd of this passage is the Good Shepherd, who, in ch. 11:4-14, is mysteriously identified with Jehovah, the same over whom the nation will mourn with a deep universal mourning in the day when the spirit of grace and of supplication is poured upon them, and their eyes are opened to perceive that in piercing Him they pierced Jehovah.

The Jews accused our Lord Jesus of blasphemy, because He claimed not only to have come from God, but that He was "equal with God"; or because when speaking of Himself as "the Good Shepherd" who layeth down His life for the sheep, He said (with probable allusion to this very passage in Zechariah): "I and My Father are one."

It was indeed a mystery passing mere human comprehension how this could be true of a man who stood in their midst. But this mystery faces us, not only in the pages of the New Testament, but in the inspired Scriptures of the prophets. There, too, the promised Redeemer is depicted as a babe born in Bethlehem, "whose goings forth are from everlasting," "a child born" in the midst of the Jewish nation, whose name is "Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Father of Eternity, Prince of Peace," a son of David, yet Jehovah Tzidkenu, a "man," and yet Jehovah's "Fellow," or equal. This mystery, like others in the pages of the Old and New Testaments, can be solved only by faith in things which are revealed, to the knowledge of which man can never attain by a mere process of reasoning.

But when thus laid hold of with a pure heart and in childlike simplicity, we are brought also to understand that the doctrine of the twofold nature of the Messiah—the fact that He is Man according to His human nature and, according to His divine nature "God blessed forever," is a necessary part in the divine philosophy of redemption unfolded in the Scriptures, for it is only a divine Savior who could redeem man from sin and death; only one in whose person the human and the divine meet who can be the true Mediator between God and man, in and through whom the broken fellowship between heaven and earth, between the Holy God and fallen man, can be fully restored. Only as man, and one who in all points was tempted even as we are, could He become the compassionate High Priest touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and able with a perfect human sympathy to enter into all our griefs and sorrows; but only as the Holy One, who Himself was pure from sin—the everlasting Son of the Father in whom dwelt "the fulness of the Godhead bodily," could He effectually succour and deliver us, and lift us out of our own innate wretchedness and sin.

Therefore, this doctrine of the twofold nature of the Messiah, which to the unbelieving is such an occasion of stumbling, is to the child of God a source of unspeakable comfort, and an occasion for unceasing praise.

But this is somewhat of a digression. To return to the passage immediately before us, it is interesting to observe that Jewish commentators themselves have admitted that the word "amithi" ("my Fellow") implies equality with God; "only since they own not Him who was God and Man they must interpret it of a false claim on the part of man," overlooking that it is God Himself who thus speaks of the shepherd of his text.

The immediate consequence of the smiting of the Shepherd is that "the sheep shall be scattered" or, as the Hebrew verb more accurately expresses it, "that the sheep may be scattered." For, although the slaying of the Messiah is (as stated above) overruled of God to the eventual gathering and blessing, not only of the Jewish nation, but of those many millions of "other sheep" from among the Gentiles, who are, as the result of Messiah's death, brought into the one fold—yet the fact of the removal by a violent death, as the direct consequence of national sin and rebellion against God, of Him who was appointed to be their Shepherd, could not but bring calamity on the flock. And this—the consequent disaster which it would bring on the people—is the primary thought associated with the slaying of the Messiah in this particular passage. It announces the fact that Jehovah will scatter the flock by smiting the shepherd: "That is to say, He will give it up to the misery and destruction to which a flock without a shepherd is exposed."

The flock which is to be thus "scattered" is neither the human race nor the Christian Church, as some commentators would have us think, but the Jewish nation, or those which the Good Shepherd was appointed to feed, according to ch. 11:1-14, but who, because of their wilful obduracy (stubbornness), are designated "sheep of slaughter."

It was primarily fulfilled when, after the crucifixion of our Lord, "the people of the prince that shall come"—that is, the Romans—destroyed the city and the sanctuary, and brought about the new and more universal phase of the dispersal of the Jewish people among all the nations of the earth, which is continued to this day.

But while this terrible judgment would fall on the nation, a little remnant would remain the object of His compassion and care. This is expressed in the words (vehashibhothi yadi al hatsoarim)—"I will turn My hand upon (or 'back upon') the little (or 'small' ones)."

The idiomatic (characteristic of native-speaker use), "to turn (or 'bring back') the hand over a person," is usually used in connection with the infliction of judgment; as, for instance, in Amos 1:8, "I will turn My hand over (or 'against' Ekron"; or Ps. 81:14: "I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned My hand over ('against') their adversaries." But I agree with Keil, Hitzig, Dr. Wright, and others, that the phrase is used here in a good sense, namely, that God will turn His hand upon "the little ones," for salvation, though that salvation may be brought about by means of chastizement. It occurs in this sense in Isa. 1:25, "in relation to the grace which the Lord will manifest towards Jerusalem by purifying it from its dross"; and it is used here in Zech. 13, also in that same sense as vv. 8 and 9 clearly show, according to which the judgment which is to come upon Israel in consequence of the Shepherd being smitten, will only be the cause of ruin to the greater portion of the nation, whereas it will bring salvation to the remnant.

The particular form of the word translated "little ones" (tsorim) does not occur elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible. Its true signification is, "those who appear as little" "those who make themselves small, or," the patient, the humble ones.

They are to be identified with "the poor of the flock" of ch. 11:7, namely, the poor and righteous in the nation who suffer oppression from the godless majority. The prophetic message, then, in the whole of the 7th verse is briefly this: The Shepherd would be smitten on account of the sin of the people, who would in consequence be scattered, but Jehovah would remember in mercy a little remnant of the flock, namely, the poor in spirit, the humble ones who are little in their own eyes, and who give heed to the word of the Lord.

The prophecy finds its fulfilment in Christ: "The Shepherd was slain"; as another writer truly observes: "When Jesus of Nazareth was crucified—an act ascribed in the New Testament no less to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, on the one hand, than to the malice of men on the other." And there, in the same inspired narrative which tells of the smiting of the Shepherd, we read also of another fulfilment of the scattering of the flock, which is, so to say, additional to the primary meaning of the prophecy, but is not altogether unconnected with the scattering of Israel and the saving of the remnant.

On the night of His betrayal, after He had partaken for the last time of the Paschal Supper, and transformed it to be henceforth the memorial supper of His death "till He come," our Lord Jesus said to His disciples: "All ye shall be offended in Me this night, for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad. But, after I am raised up, I will go before you into Galilee."

The reference is to this passage in Zechariah, though the quotation is a free one, and does not in every detail correspond with the words in the Hebrew. The meaning of the passage is, however, preserved intact. Where the words are slightly modified, it is (as is usually the case with free quotations from the Old Testament in the pages of the New) designedly so, with a view to throw a new, or additional, meaning on Old Testament prophecy in the light of the fuller unfolding of God's purpose brought about by the actual advent of the Messiah. Thus, the address to the sword to awake and smite, resolves itself in the quotation into its actual meaning, "I will smite." The offending of the disciples took place when Jesus was taken prisoner, and they all fled. This flight was a prelude to the dispersion of the flock at the death of the Shepherd. The closing words of our Lord, "I will go before you into Galilee," is, I think, rightly taken by Keil and others as a practical exposition of the words of the prophet, "I will turn My hand upon the little (or 'humble') ones" inasmuch as it was a promise of their regathering to Him and of His care for them after His resurrection.

But, to repeat, this special fulfilment did not exhaust the meaning of the prophecy as some erroneously think. "The correct view," to quote again from an English writer, "appears to be that the desertion of Christ in the hour of trial by His most faithful followers, whereby they were scattered every man to his own, and left the Savior alone—a desertion which added so much to the bitterness of that 'hour of darkness'—was indeed of importance in itself, but still more so as prefiguring the rejection of Christ by the Jewish nation, and the terrible scattering of the flock of Israel."

That the primary reference of the words, "the flock shall be scattered," etc., is to the Jewish nation, is placed beyond a doubt by the verses which follow, for the 8th verse sets forth the misery which the dispersion of the flock brings upon Israel, and the 9th verse shows how the words, "I will turn My hand upon (or, 'back upon') the little ones," would be realized in the final deliverance and salvation of the remnant: "And it shall come to pass that in all the land, saith Jehovah, two parts therein shall be cut off, shall die, and the third part shall remain therein. And I will bring the third part through (lit., 'into') the fire, and refine (or melt) them as silver is refined."

The idiomatic expression (pi sh'nayim) is found in Deut. 21:17 and 2 Kings 2:9, and is primarily used of the "double portion" inherited by the first-born; but here, in Zechariah, it means two-thirds, as is shown by the use of the word h-shelishith ("the third part") in the second half of the verse.

A parallel to this scripture is found in Ezek. 5:12, where the nation is also divided into three parts: "A third part of thee (shelishith) shall die with the pestilence, . . . and a third part shall fall by the sword, . . . and a third part I will scatter unto all the winds."

"The whole of the Jewish nation," observes Hengstenberg, "is introduced here as an inheritance left by the Shepherd who has been put to death, which inheritance is divided into three parts: death claiming the privilege of the first-born, and so receiving two portions, and life one—a division similar to that which David made in the case of the Moabites." The literalness of this division must not, however, be pressed. Isaiah, for instance, speaks of only a tenth part as escaping from the great purging judgment. Both expressions, as Dr. Wright properly observes, are to be regarded as emblematic for a comparatively small number, and not as describing the exact proportion of the remnant that should escape.

The emphatic word, ("therein"), or literally, "in it," which is twice repeated, refers to the land and not to the flock, as some interpreters explain: "In all the land . . . two-thirds in it shall be cut off, shall die." It seems to me, therefore, that, though the fulfilment may not be entirely limited to it, yet, that the reference is chiefly to the judgments which would come on the people in the land, namely, immediately after the "smiting of the Shepherd," while they were yet recognized as a nation in Palestine, though no longer in a nationally independent condition; and again after the restoration of a representative remnant in unbelief at the end of the long parenthetical period, when God's national dealings with them shall be resumed, and His long controversy with them as a nation on account of their great sin finally settled on the same soil where it originated.

And with what terrible literalness has this divine forecast been verified! During the futile, but heroic, struggle with the great Roman power, which commenced so soon after the crucifixion of the Messiah, and lasted seven years, about one million and a half Jews perished in the land by the sword and by famine and pestilence. Great numbers of Jews were crucified by the Romans outside the walls of Jerusalem, while many thousands were taken in ships to Egypt and sold as slaves. Then, not to speak of the great numbers of Jews who were during the same time done to death in different parts of the Roman Empire, only some sixty years after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, a calamity of almost equal magnitude overtook the Jewish people "throughout all the land," consequent on their renewed rising under the false Messiah, Bar Cochba.

Then, after the "two-thirds" in the land were "cut off," the remainder of "the sheep of the flock" were "scattered"; for a new stage—the universal phase in the dispersion of the Jewish nation took place consequent on the culmination of Israel's apostasy in the rejection of their Messiah.

Throughout all these centuries the Jews have suffered as no other nation on earth. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, according to reliable computations, there were only about one million Jews left in the whole world after the centuries of oppression and unparalleled sufferings which they had had to endure, especially throughout the dark Middle Ages.

And there is yet a climax to all their sufferings to be reached in the "Day" of Jacob's final great "trouble," when they are once again "in the land" and God's "fire" is kindled in Zion, and His "furnace" set up in Jerusalem for the final purging of the nation. And yet in this very prophecy we see mercy blended with judgment.

Two-thirds may be "cut off" and die, but the nation can never be utterly destroyed. There is always "a third," or "a tenth," which forms the indestructible "holy seed," which God takes care to preserve as the nucleus of the great and blessed nation through whom His holy will and His wonderful purposes in relation to this earth shall yet be realized. "I will make a full end," He says, "of all nations whither I have scattered thee, but I will not make a full end of thee."

Hence, no fires of tribulation, however hot, have been able utterly to consume them; and no waters of affliction, however deep, to drown them.

And the end of the Lord in all the chastizements and judgments with which He has to visit His people on account of their great and manifold sins, is not their destruction, but that they may, by these very judgments, as well as by the abundant mercy which He will reveal to them "in that day," be brought as a nation fully, and forever, to know Him, in all the divine perfections of His glorious character, so as to be able to fulfil their foreordained mission to show forth His praise, and to proclaim His glory among the nations.

Hence the "refining" and the "trying," or "testing," of even "the third part," or little remnant, as set forth in the 9th verse. This, I believe, refers more particularly to the remnant in the land at the time of the very end, immediately before their final glorious deliverance. Then, particularly, He will "refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried," for in the words of Malachi, "He will be like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap." He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, "and shall purge and purify them that they may offer unto Jehovah offerings in righteousness."

But from the midst of this fiery furnace of tribulation "they shall call on My Name and I will hear them: I will say, Ammi-hu. It is My people, and they shall say, Yehovah Elohoi, Jehovah is my God."

Blessed and most glorious consummation! The covenant relationship between God and His people, so long interrupted though never broken, is restored again; she that was, during the time of her wanderings from her God, Lo-ammi—"not My people," is "Ammi"—"My people" again; the national vow of Israel by which they avouched Jehovah to be their God, to walk in His ways, and ever to hearken to His voice, is now renewed, never to be broken again. Well might the prophets—contemplating the day when restored and converted Israel shall once again be, as it were, pressed to God's own heart, and in view of the glorious issues which shall result to the whole world from this restoration of covenant relations between God and "His own" people—call upon the whole creation to join in a grand chorus of praise.

*"Sing; O heavens; and be joy fill, O earth:
And break forth into singing, O mountains:
For Jehovah hath comforted His people,
And will have compassion upon His afflicted."*

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Compare Zech. 13:7 with Matt. 26:31 and Mark 14:27 and give its meaning?

Why are the saints of Zechariah 13:9 being tried by fire?

Zechariah 14:1-21

Perhaps in connection with no other scripture do the contradictions and absurdities of the allegorizing commentators appear so clearly as in their interpretations of this 14th chapter of Zechariah. Thus, according to Hengstenberg, Keil, and others of the older German expositors, who are followed by such English scholars as Pusey and C. H. H. Wright, to whose works I have so often referred in this exposition, "Israel," in this last section of Zechariah, "denotes the people of God in contradistinction to the peoples of the world; the inhabitants of Jerusalem with the house of David, and Judah with its princes, as the representatives of Israel, are typical epithets applied to the representatives and members of the new-covenant people, namely, the Christian Church; and Jerusalem and Judah, as the inheritance of Israel, are types of the seats and territories of Christendom." (Keil)

And yet, when it is a question of judgment, as, for instance, the statement that "two thirds shall be cut off and die in the land," then, of course, they are agreed that those "cut off" are literal Jews, and "the land" Palestine.

Or again, when it is a prediction which has already been fulfilled, such as the piercing of the Messiah in ch. 12:10, or the smiting of the shepherd and the scattering of the flock in ch. 13:7, then it is to be understood literally; but when the prophet speaks of things of which no fulfilment can yet be found in history, then the words, however definite and particular, must be spiritualized, and "Jerusalem" is no longer the capital of the Promised Land, but "the Church," and "Israel" no longer the literal descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but "the people of God," by which, as is seen in the quotation given above, is meant "Christendom."

But that is not really a spiritual way of interpreting Scripture, which robs it of its simple and obvious sense.

Kliefoth, Keil, etc., speak of the views expressed by Koehler and Hoffmann in their works on Zechariah, that this chapter refers to a yet future siege of Jerusalem after the return of the Jews in a condition of unbelief, and of their deliverance by the appearing of Christ, as "Jewish Chiliasm," but Jewish Chiliasm was not all wrong. There is a Messianic Kingdom—a literal reign of peace and righteousness on the earth, with Israel as its center; but where Jewish Chiliasm erred was that it overlooked, or explained away, the sufferings of the Messiah which precede the glory. The question is if these allegorizing commentators are not as much in the dark in relation to the Second Coming and the glory that should follow, as the Jews were in relation to His First Advent and His atoning suffering and death.

In the words of a true master in Israel: "The literal fulfilment of many prophecies has already taken place. It belongs to history. But the Christian has no more difficulty in believing the future fulfilment of prophecy than in crediting the record of history. He believes because God has spoken, because it is written. To believe that the Jews are scattered among all nations, that Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, that of the Temple not one stone was left upon another, requires no spiritual faith—it requires only common information. But to believe that Israel will be restored, Jerusalem rebuilt, and that all nations shall come up against the beloved city and besiege it, and that the Lord Jehovah shall appear and stand on the Mount of Olives, requires faith, for it is as yet only written in the Bible. But what difference does it make to the child of God whether the prophecy is fulfilled or not? Can he for a moment doubt it?

"And when we remember how literally prophecy has been fulfilled, we cannot but expect as literal a fulfilment in the future.

"How natural it would have been for those who lived before the First Advent, to think that only the spiritual features of the Messiah's coming and Kingdom could be the object of inspired prophecy, and that the outward and minute circumstances predicted were either allegorical and figurative, or only the drapery and embellishment of important and essential truths. And yet the fulfilment was minute even in subordinate detail." (Adolf Saphir) For our own part, it is unnecessary to say, after what we have already written on chs. 12 and 13, that we have here a great and solemn prophecy which will yet be literally fulfilled in the future. And when it is objected by some of the modern writers that the literal fulfilment is "impossible," because it would involve not only national upheavals, but physical convulsions of nature, our answer is that this is just what the prophet declares as most certainly to take place; and, as if to anticipate the objection on the ground of its being naturally "impossible," or, according to human judgment, "improbable," he reminds us at the very outset of this section of his prophecy that it is the word of Jehovah, "Who stretcheth forth the heavens, and layeth the foundation of the earth, and formeth the spirit of man within him" (Zech. 12:1) with whom nothing is impossible.

THE EXPOSITION

(Paper presented at the "Prophecy Investigation Society" meeting)

The first verses of this fourteenth chapter, which are an expansion and amplification of the last three verses of the preceding chapter, lead us back, I believe, to the point of time with which the twelfth chapter opens, and tells us of the judgment which is first allowed of God to be inflicted on Jerusalem in the final great siege by means of the marshalled Gentile armies, whose subsequent sudden destruction these chapters prophetically set forth with all the vividness of an historic event depicted by an eye-witness.

Nor need we be surprised to find in this chapter a partial reiteration of events which had already been announced by the prophet in chs. 12 and 13; for, to quote a few sentences from a writer with whose interpretation of the last chapters of Zechariah I am utterly at variance, "the prophets frequently speak generally of the final results of an event, and afterwards proceed to give further details. Any attempt to regard all the statements of the prophets as necessarily succeeding one another in chronological order, would reduce many of these prophecies to a mass of confusion." This observation is true.

But it is necessary briefly to summarize the probable events which lead up to the supreme crisis into the midst of which we are introduced in this last chapter of Zechariah.

First of all we have to suppose a restoration of the Jews in a condition of unbelief—not a complete restoration of the whole nation, which will not take place till after their conversion, but of a representative and influential remnant.

It seems from Scripture that in relation to Israel and the land there will be a restoration, before the Second Advent of our Lord, of very much the same state of things as existed at the time of His First Advent when the threads of God's dealing with them nationally were finally dropped, not to be taken up again "until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled."

There was at that time a number of Jews in Palestine representative of the nation; but compared with the number of their brethren, who were already a diaspora (dispersion) among the nations, they were a mere minority, and not in a politically independent condition.

So it will be again. There will be at first, as compared with the whole nation, only a representative minority in Palestine, and a Jewish state will be probably formed, either under the suzerainty (controlling nation) of one of the Great Powers, or under international protection.

The nucleus of this politically independent Jewish state is already to be seen in the 120,000 Jews who have wandered back from all regions of the earth to the land of their fathers (note: this was written in the early 1900's).

Already Jerusalem before the war was almost a Jewish city, while the thirty and more Jewish colonies which dotted the land were described by a prominent English Jew as "so many milestones marking the advance which Israel is making towards national rehabilitation." And in no other country in the world do the Jews, to the same extent, represent the nation. In Jerusalem and in the other Jewish settlements in Palestine I have personally, in the course of my seven different visits to the land since 1890, met Jews from all parts—from the east and the west; from India and the burning plains of Southern Arabia, and from the extreme north of Siberia and the Caucasus; and have heard them speaking in nearly all languages under heaven.

Around this nucleus a large number more from all parts of the world will in all probability soon be gathered; but we shall only be able to speak of a restoration of the Jews as an accomplished fact when Palestine becomes by international consent (to quote from the Zionist program) the "openly recognized and legally assured home" of the Jews, i.e., when the Jews are once more acknowledged as a nation with a land of their own to which they might go.

But what follows? After a brief interval of prosperity there comes a night of anguish. What occasions the darkest hour in the night of Israel's sad history since their rejection of Christ is the gathering of the nations and the siege predicted in this chapter.

If we interpret Scripture rightly, they shall have entered into covenant and sworn allegiance to a false Messiah, thus culminating their national apostasy, and fulfilling the word of Christ, "If another shall come in his own name, him ye shall receive."

But the covenant of iniquity based upon apostasy will not stand. Infuriated, probably by the faithfulness to the covenant God of their fathers on the part of the godly remnant who shall then be found in the land, the Antichrist forms the purpose of utterly and finally exterminating this people, who can never cease, even in apostasy and unbelief, to be witnesses for the living God and His truth. The armies of the confederated nations, the very flower of their strength, are marshalled together in Palestine, their watchword being, "Come, let us cut them off from being a nation, that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance."

The dreadfulness of these hosts I have already dwelt on in my notes on the 12th chapter. They march in triumph through the land, easily treading down all opposition. And now the enemy in overwhelming force and irresistible fury attacks Jerusalem, which is soon at his mercy. The city is taken, and the "spoil" or booty leisurely "divided in the midst" of her, without any fear on the part of the enemy of interruption or molestation. There ensue scenes of cruel brutality, and lust, and horrors, which usually accompany the sack of cities by enraged enemies, only intensified in this particular case by the accumulated hatred of these confederated hosts against this land and people. Half of the remaining population in the city is dragged forth into captivity, and there is but a small and wretched remnant left, which probably, in the intention of the enemy, are also devoted to destruction.

Well might another prophet exclaim, "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it; it is even the time of Jacob's trouble"

But though it is a day which begins with calamity and judgment to Israel, it is not going to end in triumph to Israel's enemies. It is preeminently the (yom la-Yehovah)—"a day for Jehovah"—the day set apart and appointed by Him, not only for the display of His majesty and the vindication of the righteousness of His character and ways, but it is the day of the manifestation of His Divine might and glory in the destruction of Israel's enemies, and the salvation of His own people. "Then shall Jehovah go forth, and fight against these nations, as when He fought in the day of battle"; or, "as in a day of His fighting in a day of conflict"—as the words in the original may more properly be rendered.

There are many instances recorded in the Old Testament when Jehovah manifestly fought for His people. In Josh. 10:14, for instance, we find words which seem echoed in this prophecy. "And there was no day like, that before it or after it" we read there, "for Jehovah fought for Israel." But I think we must agree with the Jewish Targum and those commentators who regard the reference as being particularly to the conflict between Jehovah and the Egyptians at the Red Sea; for, "of all the wars in which human insolence could claim no part of the glory," to quote the words of a well-known writer, "none was more wondrous than that in which Pharaoh and his army were sunk in the deep." It was after that great act of judgment on Israel's enemies on the part of God that Israel sang, "Jehovah is a man of war; Jehovah is His Name" (Ex. 15:3). The reference is more likely to be to this outstanding event in the past history of the Jewish people, since we know that the prophetic Scriptures generally regard the deliverance from Egypt as typical, not only of the greater spiritual redemption accomplished by Christ, but of the future greater national deliverance of Israel; and the overthrow of Pharaoh and his hosts as a fore-shadowment of the final overthrow of the enemies of God and of His people at the time of the end.

And it will be no other than Jehovah-Jesus, the El Gibbor, "God the Mighty Man," who will thus suddenly appear as Israel's deliverer in the hour of their sorest need: "And His feet" we read, "shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east."

The mountain which is so clearly defined and located in this prophecy is already associated with many events and crises in Israel's history. We especially remember that before the final overthrow of the Davidic throne and the commencement of the Times of the Gentiles, it was from this mountain, which is before Jerusalem on the east, that the prophet Ezekiel saw the glory of Jehovah finally taking its departure.

It was from this mountain also that He, who was not only the symbol, but the living personal revelation of the glory of Jehovah, finally took His departure from the land, after He had already been rejected by the nation. He led His handful of disciples out as far as Bethany (on the Mount of Olives), and He lifted up His hands and blessed them. "And it came to pass while He blessed them, He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven" (Luke 24:50-51); since when a still darker era in the long Ichabod period of Israel's history commenced.

But from the same direction from where he saw the departure of the Glory of Jehovah, the prophet Ezekiel saw also its return. "Afterwards," we read, "He brought me to the gate that looketh toward the east, and behold, the Glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east, and His voice was like the noise of many waters, and the earth shined with His glory." And what is this but a prophecy in symbolic language of the same event which the heavenly messengers announced to the men of Galilee, that "this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go up into heaven." And not only "in like manner"—that is, bodily, visibly—but He shall come to the same place from where He finally departed.

We love to think that this same mountain on which He once shed tears of sorrow over Jerusalem, the slope of which witnessed His agony and bloody sweat, shall be the first also to witness His manifestation in glory; and that His blessed feet, which in the days of His flesh walked wearily over this mountain on the way to Bethany shall, "in that day," be planted here in triumph and majesty.

In response to the actual presence of the divine majesty of the Son of God on this earth, the Mount of Olives, on which He shall descend, shall be cleft in two from east to west; half of it moving to the north and half to the south, forming "a very great valley."

Into this valley the remnant still remaining in Jerusalem will flee, "like as ye fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah king of Judah," of which earthquake there is no other mention in Scripture except in Amos 1:1. But it must have been very terrible indeed, since the memory of it survived for more than two centuries, and could still be referred to by the prophet as an occurrence fresh in the minds of the people. "Ye shall flee," as the Hebrew Text reads, "into My mountains"—the lofty precipitous sides of this newly formed chasm, or valley, being called His mountains, because they were formed by an act of His power. This may, in a sense, be regarded as a parallel to the passage through the Red Sea after it was divided by the power of God, and "the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left" (Ex. 14:22).

The occasion of this flight will not only be fear of the destroying enemy, and the terror inspired by the earthquake, but they shall flee most of all "for fear of Jehovah, and the glory of His majesty," when thus suddenly and unexpectedly "the Lord my God shall come" in the person of their long-rejected Messiah, "and all the holy ones with Thee"—by which are meant, not only the myriads of His holy angels, but His saints, who are also called qedoshim ("holy ones"), and who shall have been caught up to meet the Lord in the air.

It is at this point, I believe, that the solemn events announced from the 4th verse of ch. 12 to the 2nd verse of ch. 13 will transpire.

The first proof of the Lord's interposition on behalf of His people and land, will be His act of judgment on the besieging hosts. The pride of the glory of the marshalled armies will probably be in the mounted squadrons, which will no doubt include the finest horsemen of Europe and Arabia, and against them the Captain of the Lord's host shall first direct His hand: "In that day I will smite every horse with astonishment, and his rider with madness." (Zech. 12:4)

Then the extended ranks of infantry shall be visited with the plague described in ch. 14:12, and a great tumult from the Lord shall ensue among the confederated hosts, as happened in the past, when Jehovah fought for Israel; so that each man's hand shall be against his neighbor.

And not only by the direct act of God shall the enemy be destroyed, but, as already shown in my notes on ch. 12, with the shout of a king in their midst, and conscious that Almighty power is now on their side, the remnant of Judah, too, will do valiantly, and tread down their enemies under their feet: "He that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David, and the house of David shall be as God, as the Angel of the Lord before them."

But suddenly the noise of war and the shout of triumph is turned into wailing and lamentation as the spirit of grace and supplication takes possession of the heart of the remnant of Israel, and the eyes of the blind are opened, and they behold in the King of Glory, at whose presence the earth trembles and the mountains are cleft, and who has so marvellously delivered them in the hour of their greatest need, none other than the one whom they have pierced, and whom for so many centuries they have rejected and despised. This look of recognition, as we have seen in ch. 12, will break Israel's heart, and "they shall mourn for Him as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for Him as one that is in bitterness for his firstborn."

And not only will the sorrow and mourning spread from Jerusalem to the whole land, but also to the whole earth; for, though Jerusalem and Palestine will be the center of these awful and solemn events, the whole world will be more or less involved in them.

When the final judgments of God are abroad in the earth, and when the anti-Christian rage and persecution will be everywhere directed not only against the confessors of Christ, but against those in Israel who are faithful to the God of their fathers, there will be weeping, and mourning, and heart-searching among the scattered tribes of Israel in all the lands of their dispersion.

And when at last, in the hour of their deepest need, their long-rejected, crucified Messiah appears for their deliverance—when His blessed feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives—they will almost simultaneously be made aware of it; for, though they may not all at once behold Him with their eyes, the whole world, and nature generally, will be conscious of, and respond to, the visible appearing and presence of the Son of God.

And the spared remnant of the dispersed of Israel will, like their brethren in Jerusalem, hail Him—though at first it may be from a distance—whom they crucified, and turn to Him in true repentance.

But to proceed to the 6th verse.

In keeping with the awful solemn events shall be the outward natural phenomena and physical characteristics of that fateful day. It shall be a day of preternatural gloom. "There shall be no light, the "precious ones" (i.e., the stars, "the splendid heavenly bodies") will contract themselves (or "wane"), which I believe to be the true meaning of the two last, somewhat difficult Hebrew words of the 6th verse, which have been variously rendered and interpreted by commentators. This is in harmony with the plain declarations of other prophetic announcements concerning that day; as, for instance, "The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining" (Joel 3:15), or, in the words of Isaiah: "The moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously" (Isa. 24:23); and again: "The stars of heaven, and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light: the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine" (Isa. 13:10).

"But in those days after that tribulation the sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall be falling from heaven, and the powers that are in the heaven shall be shaken" (Mark 13:24-25).

And it shall be yom echad, "one day," we read in our prophecy—"one" primarily in the sense of its being unique and different to all other days in the world's history, "so that none is like it," as Jeremiah expresses it, "and it shall be known to Jehovah," which phrase certainly reminds us of the words of our Lord: "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father" (Mark 13:32)—"Not day nor night"—"like mysterious light when day and night are contending together." It shall not be day, for the natural sources of light will be withdrawn; but it cannot be like the darkness of night, for there will be the transcendent light of the glory of the Lord, and the myriads of His holy angels, and of the glorified saints reflected on the earth.

"And it shall come to pass that at evening time"—when in the order of nature everything should sink into darkness—"there shall be light"; out of the contest between light and darkness on that eventful day light shall emerge victorious—"the light of salvation breaking its way through the night of judgment," as Von Orelli observes; and out of the apparent chaos beauty and order.

As far as its primary literal significance is concerned, the statement that "at evening time there shall be light," may perhaps be explained by the words of Isaiah: "The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days, in the day that Jehovah bindeth up the hurt of His people and healeth the stroke of their wound." (Isa. 30:26)

But this literal physical phenomenon will answer also to the spiritual condition of the spared remnant. "At evening time" of that great and most solemn day—the great Atonement Day for the nation—when the long dark period of their national history shall end in bitter sorrow and universal mourning, not on account of their suffering, but for their sin; when the glorious Sun of Righteousness shall at last rise upon them with healing in His wings, "there shall be light"—the light and the joy of forgiveness and eternal reconciliation; the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ which shall shine upon them.

"We can in part conceive the feelings with which the spared remnant of Israel will behold the light of that evening—the evening which is to introduce the new order of God. They have been described in the 12th chapter as subdued, contrite, and mourning. And no marvel: carried as they will have been by a power that they knew not, through such a day of terror, strengthened for the Lord in it, and left at last in a scene of tranquil blessing received from the hands of One whom they had despised, but to whom they have now learned to say 'My Lord, and my God'; it would be strange indeed if they should not, numbering such mercies, be bowed in contrition of spirit. And when they shall at last be comforted, and the Spirit be poured out upon them from on high, when the knowledge of their own past history and of the Church's history will all be opened to them in the light of God, then, like so many Pauls, monuments of Sovereign grace, they shall go forth to the dark places of the earth, rich in experience and in the knowledge of God, and from them shall flow rivers of living waters." (B. W. Newton)

The blessed issues of the great and solemn events of "that day," as set forth in the first seven verses, are described in the verses that follow:—

1. By means of the great earthquake spoken of in vv. 4 and 5, and other convulsions of nature which are immediately to precede and to accompany the visible appearing of the Messiah, when His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives—great physical changes will take place in Palestine and the whole land, but particularly the position of Jerusalem will be greatly altered and transformed. (Isa. 30:25-26) "And it shall come to pass in that day that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them toward the eastern sea, and half of them toward the western sea; in summer and in winter shall it be."

The "eastern" (Jiaqqadmoni, which has sometimes also the meaning of "ancient") is the Dead Sea, which shall then be healed by the streams of fresh, or "living," water which will flow through it; and the western ka-acharon (literally, the "last" or "hindmost") is the Mediterranean. And these waters will never run dry, as the streams in the south (Ps. 126:4) are apt to do now: "summer drought shall not lessen them, nor winter cold bind them," but they shall ceaselessly flow "in summer and in winter." To these perennial waters flowing from the "river of God" (Ps. 65:9), primarily so called, because it is formed, as it were, by a direct act of His power, there are many references in the prophetic Scriptures.

Thus Joel, speaking of the time when Jehovah shall manifestly dwell in Zion, and "Jerusalem shall be holy," into which nothing that defileth shall enter, says, "And a fountain shall come forth from the house of Jehovah and shall water the valley of Shittim" (Joel 3:18); and in Ps. 46, which is a great prophecy of the same solemn events which are described in these last chapters of Zechariah, the inspired Psalmist beholds in vision "a river the streams whereof make glad the city of God" (Ps. 46:4), namely, restored and renewed Jerusalem, the vestibule, as it were, during the millennial period of the Jerusalem which is above—which shall emerge from the catastrophe described in the first verses, when the earth shall "be removed," or "changed," and the "mountains shaken into the heart of the seas, and the waters roar and be troubled."

The allusion in all these scriptures, which speak of the river of living waters dividing themselves into streams flowing in different directions, is probably to Gen. 2:10. There we read: "And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted and became four heads," or streams. Now, since for beauty and fertility, and as the earthly center of God's dwelling and worship, Jerusalem and Palestine will, in the millennial period, answer, as it were, to the garden of Eden—there is again the River, the streams whereof make glad the city of God, and flowing thence fertilize other parts of the earth.

Now, to repeat, we believe, in a literal fulfilment of this prophecy in Zechariah, and when we are told by a scholarly English writer that a literal fulfilment is out of the question because "the physical nature of the whole land would have to be changed to permit literal rivers to flow forth from Jerusalem" (C. H. H. Wright), our answer is, "Certainly; this is just what the prophecy says will be the case." The physical nature of the whole land will be changed through the convulsions of nature, which are described here and in other scriptures, and which will be brought about by the Almighty power of God, with whom nothing is impossible. But while this literal fulfilment cannot be emphasized too strongly in order to a true understanding of these prophecies, it is important also to note that the literal, material river will be at the same time the visible symbol of the mighty river of God's grace and salvation, which, during the millennial period dividing itself into full streams of Messianic blessings, will start from Jerusalem as its source and center, and carry life and salvation to all nations.

"We read in many parts of the Scripture that the land of Israel will in that day teem with evidences of the miraculous power of God in dispensing blessings. On the sides of Zion, for example, the wolf and the lamb, the leopard and the kid, shall be seen together, and a little child shall lead them. Nothing shall hurt or destroy throughout God's holy mountain. These will be sights that no one will deny to be in themselves blessed. But they are symbols also, living symbols, speaking of higher blessings; for they indicate the peace and harmony and love that shall pervade all hearts and all peoples whom the power of Zion shall effectually reach. And if God has appointed that the spiritual influence of which I have spoken above should go forth from His forgiven and privileged nation in Jerusalem, we might expect to find some outward symbol of this, its relation. And, accordingly, a symbol is given in the perennial flow of those streams which, going forth from the sanctuary in Jerusalem, shall heal waters, which, like the Dead Sea, have been accursed, and spread life and refreshment in the midst of desolation." (B. W. Newton)

As the symbol of the greater spiritual reality, let us pause and contemplate for a moment this "river of God." Its source is God Himself. "There," exclaims the prophet Isaiah—that is, in renewed and glorified Jerusalem—"The glorious Jehovah" (or, "Jehovah in His Majesty") "will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams." (Isa. 33:21) Or, in the language of the beloved John in the Apocalypse, "He showed me a river of water of life bright as crystal proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb." (Rev. 22:1) Yes, "and of the Lamb" for though God is the Source, the Eternal Fountain of this pure Water of Life, the Lamb slain is the channel through which it flows.

Another glorious fact emphasized in the Scriptures in connection with these living waters is their fulness—indicative of the abundance of God's grace and salvation, which shall go forth during the period of Messiah's reign, from Jerusalem as its center, into all parts of the world. The "River of God," we read, "is full of water" (Ps. 65:9) and Ezekiel beholds it in vision "as a river which he could not pass through, for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed through." (Ezek. 47:1-12)

And as they are abundant in quantity, so also is the healing, life-giving efficacy of the living waters wonderful. The very desert shall be transformed by them, and the stagnant waters of the Dead Sea healed. "Everything," says Ezekiel, "and every living creature which swarmeth in every place whither the river shall come, shall live; . . . and by the river upon the bank thereof on this side, and on that side, shall grow every tree for meat, whose leaf shall not wither, neither shall the fruit thereof fail; it shall bring forth new fruit every month, because the waters thereof issue out of the sanctuary; and the fruit shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for healing." Yes, "for the healing of the nations" (Rev.22:2), as the beloved Apostle adds in the last chapter of the Apocalypse, where Ezekiel's imagery of the earthly but glorified Jerusalem during the millennial period is transferred also to the heavenly Jerusalem.

A foretaste of the great spiritual realities, which in the age to come will be symbolized also by literal and visible objects, we have indeed in the present dispensation, for those are not wholly wrong who point to the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ as embodying the very qualities ascribed to these "living waters," and many there be who can testify from experience to its life-giving, healing, sanctifying power, and to the great and glorious transformations which it has effected in the world since Christ's first Advent. But, whereas its course now and all through the present period is an intermittent, chequered one, and its quickening power has been experienced only by individuals, by-and-by, when Israel as a nation is first quickened and transformed by it, and the national Saul of Tarsus is turned into a nation of Pauls, with the same burning love and self-consuming zeal for their Redeemer-King, which characterized the great Apostle to the Gentiles—the blessings of Messiah's Gospel, and the beneficent effects of His reign—will flow from Jerusalem as mighty rivers and streams into all parts of the world, so that it will not be long before "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea." (Hab. 2:14)

2. Another glorious issue of the solemn events described in the first seven verses of our chapter will be the establishment of Messiah's righteous and beneficent rule on earth, and the fulfilment of the prayer which has ascended from the yearning hearts of the faithful in all ages: "Thy Kingdom come." This is announced in the 9th verse: "And Jehovah shall be King over all the earth: in that day shall Jehovah be one and His Name one." In this great and comprehensive prophecy we note especially two or three points: (a) "Jehovah shall be King"—but according to the united and harmonious testimony of the prophetic Scriptures it will be Jehovah in the person of the Messiah, Jehovah-Jesus, Immanuel—He whose feet shall in that day stand on the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the east—who will thus set up His Kingdom and rule on this earth. And He will be King, not only in virtue of His being the Son of God, in whose coming and reign the long-promised rule of God Himself on this earth shall at last be realized in the fullest possible measure, but by reason of His being the Son of Man—the second Adam—the appointed Lord of creation, in whom the original purpose of God in the creation of man and of the world shall be fulfilled, and as the Son of David, in whom all the promises of the Messianic Kingdom are centered, before whose birth it was announced by the angel from heaven, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David. And He shall reign over the House of Jacob forever; and of His Kingdom there shall be no end."

All that is implied in the blessed announcement that Jehovah Himself shall at last be King over this earth, and in the person of His own Son, who is at the same time the man after His own heart, visibly rule among the nations, we cannot yet fully conceive. "Our ideas of kingship," to quote the words of a master in Israel, "are limited, and do not come up to the divine conception." (Adolph Saphir) Man has had experience of rule, or kingship on earth, but "the true or real king among men has not appeared yet." The nearest approach to His rule was David's; but what are the last words of the son of Jesse, the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Israel and the sweet Psalmist of Israel? His last testimony was that the Spirit of the Lord had spoken by him, and that he had heard the Rock of Israel, and that the sum and substance of these divine revelations was the coming of the perfect King: "One that ruleth over men righteously, that ruleth in the fear of God, He shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, a morning without clouds, when the tender grass springeth out of the earth through clear shining after rain." (2 Sam. 33:1-4 R. V.)

For this ideal King, for this glorious "Sun" to usher in "the morning without clouds" on this groaning earth, the nations have long waited; but He shall come, and the world will experience the blessedness of His righteous and beneficent sway.

(b) The extent of His rule—"over all the earth." As explained more than once in the course of these notes, eretz, translated "earth," means both "land" and "earth"; and the primary reference in this prophecy is doubtless to "the holy land" (Zech. 2:12), as the enlarged and purified Land of Promise shall then be called. The word is used in this more restricted sense in the very next verse of our chapter, where it is rightly translated "land." But while the holy hill of Zion shall be the seat of His throne, and Palestine, with restored and converted Israel, the center of His blessed rule, "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth"; yea, all kings shall fall down before Him (Ps. 72:8-11), all nations shall serve Him, for all the kingdoms of this world shall then become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever.

That the prophet's vision of the theocratic kingdom ranged beyond even the enlarged boundaries of the "land," and extended to the whole "earth" is seen also from the 16th verse, where he speaks of all the nations coming up to Jerusalem "to worship the King-Jehovah of Hosts," whose sole rule they will then acknowledge. Yes, Messiah's kingship is to extend over the earth. God's will, according to the petition which He teaches His disciples, is to be done on earth as it is in heaven.

"It is on earth, where God has been denied and forgotten; where His honor has been disregarded and His commandments have been transgressed; where nations and kingdoms, instead of seeking His glory and showing forth His praise—have not bowed to His authority and revered His law; it is on earth that the Lord shall reign; injustice, cruelty and war shall be banished; and instead of idolatry, selfishness and sin, the fear and love and beauty of God will be manifest. Christ and the glorified saints shall reign over Israel and the nations. The appearances of the risen Lord to His disciples during the forty days seem to be a prophetic parallel of the relation of the transfigured Church to the earth. Jerusalem is the center of the world; the land of Israel is restored to wonderful fertility and blessedness. We may not be able clearly to conceive the fulfilment of the predictions concerning this earth during the Christocracy, but our danger does not lie in believing too implicitly or too literally what is written." (Adolf Saphir) And this kingship over the "earth" is due to our Lord Jesus as an answer to His humiliation. "It is not sufficient that He is glorified in heaven—it is a perfect delight to His own that He is to be glorified and adored in the very scene of His rejection and shame. God will see to this. Here, where His royal claims were scorned, every knee shall bow to Him; here, where He was reviled and insulted, every tongue shall own that "He is Lord to the glory of God the Father. His Name shall be excellent in all the earth."

3. "In that day," the prophet adds, "shall Jehovah be One"—that is, recognized and acknowledged as such, and be known and called the "God of the whole earth" (Isa. 54:5), the only and blessed Potentate (1 Tim.6:15); for the false gods of the nations, to whom even Israel was tempted in former days of apostasy to render worship, shall be "cut off," and all idols utterly abolished.

"And His Name"—which embodies His revealed character as the God of Redemption, the faithful covenant-keeping God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, now fully made known to us by our Lord Jesus Christ, who is Himself the fullest revelation of the Name, shall be "One"—to the exclusion of all others—as the only object of reverence, praise, and worship, "so that he who blesseth himself in the earth shall bless himself in the God of truth; and he that sweareth in the earth shall swear by the God of truth" (Isa. 65:16); and the nations, even from "the ends of the earth," confess that the gods which they had formerly worshipped were "no gods," and the idolatries which they had inherited from their fathers were "naught but lies, even vanity, and things wherein there is no profit." (Jer. 16:19-20)

4. As "the city of the great King" (Ps. 48:2), whose dominion extends to earth's utmost bounds, and as the center from where God's light and truth shall go forth among all the nations, Jerusalem is also to be physically exalted above the hills by which she has up to now been surrounded and overshadowed. This is the announcement in the 10th verse: "All the land shall be turned" (or "changed" so that it shall become "as," or) "like the Arabah." Then the district to be thus transformed is more closely defined, namely, "from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem." Geba, probably the same as Gibeah of Saul, was in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 19:13), and is mentioned in 2 Kings 23:8 as one of the northern border towns of the land of Judah. Rimmon was on the southern border of Palestine, and is identified by some scholars with the modern Umm-er-Rummamin, north of Beersheba. The words "south of Jerusalem" are added, to distinguish this latter place from the town Rimmon in Galilee (Judg. 20:45-47) (identified with Rummaneh), and from the rock Rimmon in the hill range of Benjamin. (Jud. 20:45-47)

All this district from Geba to Rimmon is to be changed and become "as the Arabah". This word, translated "plain" in the A.V., is the proper name of the Jordan valley—"that remarkable depression which runs from the slopes of Hermon to the Red Sea, known as the deepest depression in the surface of the globe"; the sea of Galilee situated within it being 652 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, while the Dead Sea, which is also included in its course, is 1316 feet below that level, or the level of the Red Sea. Parts of this valley were distinguished for their luxurious vegetation, but the reference here is not to its fertility nor to its deep depression, which probably will itself undergo modification in that day of great physical as well as moral upheavals, but to the fact of its being a plain.

The whole hill-country specified shall be levelled or become a plain, "and she" (i.e., Jerusalem) "shall be lifted up" (or "exalted") "and shall dwell" (or "become settled") "in her place" literally, "upon that which was under her," upon her own tel, or mound, as Jeremiah expresses it. (Jer. 30:18)

In this brief statement about the towering position of Jerusalem in that day the prophet Zechariah gives us also, as is his habit, a terse summary of the longer predictions of the former prophets; for already Isaiah and Micah, as well as Ezekiel, announced that "it shall come to pass in the latter days that the mountain of Jehovah's house shall be established on the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills." (Isa. 2:2)

And here again, as in the case of the "living waters" in the 8th verse, the literal fact will at the same time be emblematic of a great spiritual truth. Zion in the millennial age will be the city of truth, "the habitation of righteousness and mountain of holiness," and therefore will be raised conspicuously aloft in the view of all the nations; it will be the source whence the living waters of God's grace and salvation are to issue in all directions, and therefore every obstacle which might hinder their flow shall be "changed" and turned into a plain. It will be the center of God's governmental rule of the world, and the place to which "all nations shall flow" for instruction and guidance, and therefore it must be lifted high, and approach to it rendered easy.

In the words of the beautiful paraphrase of the prophetic announcement by Isaiah and Micah:

Behold! the mountain of the Lord
In latter days shall rise
On mountain-tops above the hills,

And draw the wond'ring eyes.

To this the joyful nations round,
All tribes and tongues, shall flow;
"Up to the hill of God," they'll say,
"And to His house we'll go!"

The beam that shines from Zion's hill
Shall lighten ev'ry land;
The King who reigns in Salem's towers
Shall all the world command.

Among the nations He shall judge—
His judgments truth shall guide;
His sceptre shall protect the just
And quell the sinner's pride.

The second half of the 10th verse describes the bounds of the restored and enlarged city, which shall thus be "lifted up" and settled down to dwell safely "in her own place."

"From Benjamin's gate into the place of the first (or 'former') gate, unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hananel unto the king's winepresses."

I shall not trouble my readers with topographical details, all the more as by general confession the gates and towers here named cannot with any certainty be identified. Suffice it here to say that "Benjamin's gate," which is very probably the same as "the gate of Ephraim," mentioned in 2 Kings 14:13, was in the north wall of the city through which the road to Benjamin, and thence to Ephraim, ran.

The first (or "former") "gate," which no longer existed in Zechariah's time, since only the place where it once stood is referred to, is supposed to have been at the northeastern corner, and the "corner gate" (which is also mentioned in 2 Kings 14:13 as well as in Jer. 31:38) at the north-western corner.

If these suppositions be correct, this line would describe the whole breadth of the city from east to west, while the tower of Hananel (See Jer. 31:38, Neh. 3:1, 12:39), which stood at the north or north-east corner, and "the king's winepresses," which all are agreed were in the king's gardens south of the city, would indicate the northern and southern boundaries. But the chief importance of these local and topographical details in this great prophecy is the proof which they afford that it must be literally understood, and that it is of Jerusalem and Palestine that the prophet primarily speaks, or what can the allegorizing commentators make of these physical landmarks and boundaries, such as "the gate of Benjamin" and "the corner gate"? And in what part of the heavenly Jerusalem can "the tower of Hananel" and "the king's winepresses" be located?

5. The 11th verse gives us in three brief sentences a glimpse of the blessed condition of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, which shall be thus renewed and established.

(a) "And they shall dwell in her," that is, permanently and at peace, "nevermore to go forth from it either in captivity or in flight." (Koehler) In the words of one of the former prophets, Jacob then "shall be quiet and at ease, and none shall make him afraid." (Jer. 30:10)

(b) "And there shall be no more curse" (or "ban," or "sentence of destruction," as the word may be rendered), because the causes which previously provoked the Holy One to inflict desolating and destructive judgments upon the land and people shall be no more. Another glorious and blessed contrast with the past, when on account of manifold and continuous transgressions He had to "profane the princes of the sanctuary, and give Jacob over to the curse (hereni) and Israel to reproaches" (or "reviling"). (Isa. 43:28)

(c) "And Jerusalem shall dwell (or 'shall be inhabited') safely, or literally, in conscious security" (labhetach) or "in confidence"; for, though it shall be surrounded neither by walls, nor fortifications, it shall have nothing to fear. "For I, saith Jehovah, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and the glory in the midst of her" (Zech. 2:4-5) and "salvation" will Jehovah appoint for walls and bulwarks. (Isa. 26:1) This outline picture of the blessed condition of restored and purified Jerusalem, which in the millennial period will be, so to say, the earthly vestibule and the reflection of the glory of the new or heavenly Jerusalem, which shall come down from God out of heaven, is filled in by the inspired utterances of the "former" prophets (on which the prophecies of Zechariah are more or less based), but particularly in the last chapters of Isaiah: "For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former things shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in My people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more from that place an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old, and the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. . . . They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for calamity: for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. And it shall come to pass that, before they call, I will answer, and while they are yet speaking I will hear. The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox: and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain, saith the Lord." (Isa. 65:17-20, 23-25)

The glorious picture of salvation in vv. 8-12 has its obverse side, namely, the judgments which will be inflicted on the enemies of God and His people. Chronologically, vv. 12-15 follow v. 3, for the terrible punishment of the confederated anti-Christian hosts which they describe (and which are amplification and supplement to the prophetic announcement of the destruction of these same Gentile hosts in ch. 12:4-10) are the immediate consequence of the manifest interposition of Jehovah in the person of the Messiah as the Deliverer of His people, when He shall "go forth and fight against those nations as when He fought in the day of battle"; but the detailed description of the judgments on Israel's enemies is passed over by the prophet for a time in order that the wonderful deliverance of God's people and the glorious transformation of Jerusalem and the "Holy Land" might be first fully described.

Three weapons will be used by God for the destruction of the enemies of His Kingdom: (1) The fearful plague described in verse 12; (2) mutual destruction in consequence of a great panic of terror "from Jehovah"; and (3) the superhuman strength of the saved remnant of Judah, who shall suddenly become like "a pan of fire" among wood, and like "a flaming torch among sheaves" (Zech. 12:6) and shall devour their enemies round about, on their right hand and on their left. Of these three simultaneous judgments, the first two are spoken of as being inflicted by God's own hand, for maggepha, rendered "plague" (which is used in the Hebrew for "infliction" "slaughter," "plague," "pestilence"), always denotes a plague or judgment sent direct by God. (Ex. 9:14, Num. 14:39, 1 Sam. 6:4)

The description of the "plague" is terribly realistic. Literally, "He (Jehovah) makes his flesh to rot (or consume away), while he standeth on his feet (vehu omed al raglav), which is perhaps intended to express the suddenness with which God's stroke will alight upon him: "And his eye (singular) shall consume away in their sockets (plural); and his tongue (singular) shall consume away in their mouth (plural)." The thought which the prophet probably intends to express, by the use of the singular suffix, is that this terrible catastrophe shall overtake each one and the whole company. "It is," as another has expressed it, "the act of God in His individual justice to each one of all those multitudes gathered against Him." One by one their eyes, of which they said, "Let our eye look (or 'gaze') upon Zion" (Mic. 4:11) (i.e., with joy at her desolation), shall consume away in their sockets, and their tongue, with which (like Rabshakeh and the Assyrians in a former siege of Jerusalem) (Isa. 36:18-22, 37:4) they blasphemed God, shall consume away in their mouth—a truly terrible judgment, intended as a warning to men that it is a fearful thing to be arrayed against Jehovah and His Anointed, or against the people and the city with which He and His cause shall in that day be identified.

The m'humath Jehovah—literally, a "tumult of Jehovah," with which the gathered hosts shall also be seized in that day, is the supernatural panic and "confusion" which Jehovah sends among His enemies, with a view to their utter discomfiture and self-destruction. It is the same as the "astonishment" and "madness" with which the horses and the riders of these same hosts are spoken of as smitten in ch. 12:4, and as a consequence "they shall lay hold" (hech'ziqu, a verb which is used generally but not exclusively of "laying hold," or "seizing violently" with evil intent) "every one on the hand of his neighbor." Each in that tumultuous, panic-stricken throng shall seize the other's hand, "mastering him powerfully," with a view to his destruction—"and his hand (i.e., each man's hand) shall be lifted up against the hand of his neighbor," with a view to deliver a deadly blow.

Such "confusions" or tumult the Lord had sent before in the midst of Israel's enemies. Thus the hosts of Midian were discomfited before Gideon and his little band, and the multitude of Philistines at Michmash "melted away" before Jonathan and his armor-bearer. (Judges 7:22, 1 Sam. 13:16-20)

But the historical instance of the self-destruction of the enemies of God's people by means of such a "confusion" or panic sent by the Lord, to which the prophet seems specially to allude as an illustration of what will overtake the confederated anti-Christian hosts in the future, is that recorded in 2 Chron. 20, when, in answer to the prayer of Jehoshaphet, the hosts of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir, which were gathered against Judah, suddenly fell on one another. "And when they began to sing and to praise, the Lord set liers in wait against the children of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir, which were come against Judah; and they were smitten. For the children of Ammon and Moab stood up against the inhabitants of Mount Seir, utterly to slay and destroy them: and when they had made an end of the inhabitants of Seir, every one helped to destroy another."

The first clause of the 14th verse has been rendered by some, "And Judah also shall fight against Jerusalem," but there is no justification for it in grammar, and it is altogether contrary to the context: literally, "And Judah also"—which stands here for the whole remnant of the people—"shall fight at (or 'in') Jerusalem." It indicates the third weapon which (in addition to the "plague" and the "tumult") will be used by God for the destruction of the confederated hosts, which had all but succeeded in utterly exterminating the remnant of His people.

While their foes are consumed by the "plague" and engaged in fighting with one another in consequence of the "confusion" or tumult sent among them by the Lord, the remnant of Judah, "also" conscious now that the Captain of the Lord's host is with them, and that Almighty power is now on their side, are suddenly stirred up to do valiantly and have a share in utterly destroying them.

One consequence of the utter discomfiture of these hosts around Jerusalem is that "the wealth of all the nations round about shall be gathered together, gold and silver and apparel in great abundance"; where again we have an allusion by the prophet to historical incidents in the past history of the nation as foreshadowments of the future.

Thus, in 2 Chron. 20, to which reference has already been made, after the overthrow of the hosts of Ammon and Moab and the inhabitants of Mount Seir, we read that Jehoshaphat and his people gathered into Jerusalem "spoil in abundance, both riches and garments and precious jewels"; and thus also, when the hosts of Syrians, who were besieging Samaria, were suddenly seized with panic, fled because the Lord had made them "hear a noise of chariots and horses and of a great host"—they left behind abundance of silver and gold and raiment. (2 Kings 7:2-8)

And inasmuch as these hosts, by their enmity against God and His people, have brought themselves under His ban for utter destruction, the animals which they have brought with them for this campaign against the holy land and city, will also be overtaken with the same fate as their masters.

"And so shall be the plague of the horse, of the mule, and of the camel, and of the ass, and of all the beasts that shall be in those camps as their masters."

This, as Hengstenberg points out, is in accord with the Mosaic law in reference to the cherem, or "ban." When a whole city had committed the crime of idolatry, not only the inhabitants, but the animals also, were put to death; in which case the same law affecting the relation between the irrational and rational portions of the creation was repeated on a small scale as that which caused the animal creation to be "subject to vanity," not willingly, "on account of the sin of man." An instance of this we have in the case of Achan, whose oxen, asses, and sheep were stoned and burned, along with himself and his children. (Josh. 7:24-25)

Blessed be God, "creation," which has become involved in the sin and consequent suffering and death of man, is to participate also in the benefits of the great redemption which has been accomplished by our Lord Jesus Christ, and shall yet be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. (Rom. 8:20-22)

But there is a beneficent end in the very judgments of God, for through them the nations will at last learn righteousness, and the fruit will be "universal homage to the Universal Ruler" (Van Orelli), Jehovah of Hosts, and in the person of the Messiah, under whose sway all nations shall then be blessed. "And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations that come up against Jerusalem shall go up from year to year to worship the King, Jehovah of Hosts, and to keep the Feast of Tabernacles."

First, it should be observed that when it is said that all nations and families of the earth shall come up to Jerusalem from year to year to worship Jehovah, and in acknowledgment of Israel's national supremacy in the millennial earth, it is not meant that every individual in each nation shall come up, but that the nations shall come up representatively. "The actions of nations and all corporate bodies is always spoken of in Scripture with reference to those who are officially appointed to express or carry out their will. Thus in the great gathering against Jerusalem the nations concerned therein are represented by their armies. Every individual in each nation will not be present, yet each nation is said to be there."

The commentators differ as to why the Feast of Tabernacles is singled out as the one which all the nations are represented in this prophecy as coming up to Jerusalem to celebrate; and very few see the deep typical and spiritual truth set forth by this "Hag-Yehovah"—the "Feast of Jehovah" (Lev. 23:39), as it is emphatically called in Lev. 23, which has been properly styled "The Sacred Calendar of the History of Redemption," because it sets forth, by a series of striking types (foreshadows), not only the great facts, but the very order in which the various stages of God's great redemption scheme for the world were to unfold themselves in the course of time. Briefly, it may be said that the nations are represented as coming up to Jerusalem to keep the Feast of Tabernacles because the spiritual truths set forth by this particular type shall then be realized—for Jerusalem shall then be the metropolis of God's Kingdom on earth, and the joy and blessedness foreshadowed by that feast will then not only be the portion of saved Israel, but shall also pervade all nations of the earth.

But to understand this more clearly we must examine a little more fully the historical and prophetic character of this feast. Primarily Tabernacles was, above all the other feasts, "the harvest festival of joy and thanksgiving, in celebration not only of the full ingathering of the 'labors of the field,' but also of the fruit and of the vintage, and is therefore pre-eminently styled 'the Feast of Ingatherings'" (Ex. 23:16; 34:22; Deut. 16:13).

It had, moreover, a clear retrospective or commemorative significance, as is plainly stated in the command that they should dwell in booths: "And ye shall take you on the first day the fruit of the goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook, and ye shall rejoice before Jehovah your God seven days, . . . ye shall dwell in booths seven days, . . . that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths when I brought them out of the land of Egypt; I am Jehovah your God" (vv. 40-43)—an ordinance well calculated indeed to keep alive in their mind the grateful remembrance of the God of Israel, who sustained them miraculously in the wilderness, and led them by the hand of Moses, Aaron, and Joshua, safely into the promised land.

The rabbis in later times regarded the Sukkah (tabernacle), in which they dwelt during the feast, as more especially symbolical of the cloud of glory which hovered over the tabernacle, and which led and shielded Israel by day and illumined them by night in their forty years' wilderness wanderings; but even the Mishna and the Talmud single out this feast from all the others as being of an anticipative or prophetic character, while Christian scholars and Bible students are in agreement that there is nothing in this dispensation to answer to the Feast of Tabernacles. No, its fulfilment is yet in the future, when, after Israel's national Day of Atonement shall have come to pass, and the nation which was destined of God from the beginning to be the channel of blessing to the world shall have been reconciled and cleansed, and equipped by the power of God to go forth on its mission of spreading the knowledge of their Messiah over the whole earth, the great "Feast of Ingathering" shall take place, and "all peoples" shall sit down to the "feast of fat things, yea, a feast of wines on the lees (wine sediment), of fat things full of marrow," which Jehovah of hosts has prepared for them on Mount Zion.

Though not part of the original Mosaic appointment, the ceremonial service of this feast, which was in practice in the Temple, was also designed to point and emphasize its symbolic and prophetic significance. I will mention only two or three features of that ritual.

1. Simchat-bet-ha-Sho'ebhah— literally, "Joy of the House of Drawing (the water); or, the Ceremonial of Water Libation."

Every morning of the feast, a joyous procession, accompanied by music and headed by a priest bearing a golden pitcher, measuring just a little over two pints, made its way from the temple courts to the Pool of Siloam. At the same time another procession went to the place in the Kedron valley called Moza, or Colonia, whence they brought willow branches, which they bound on either side of the altar of burnt-offering, "bending them over towards it so as to form a kind of leafy canopy."

Then the ordinary sacrifice proceeded, "the priest who had gone to Siloam so timing it that he returned just as his brethren carried up the pieces of the sacrifice to lay them on the altar. As he entered by the Water Gate, which obtained its name from this ceremony, he was received by a threefold blast from the priests' trumpets." Amid great demonstrations of excitement and joy this water was poured into a silver basin, or tube, on the altar, simultaneously with the prescribed libation of wine, which was poured into another tube.

On the seventh day, called the "Hoshanna rabba," the great Hosanna, the joy and excitement of the people reached their climax. The joyous crowds of worshippers on that day, seen from one of the flat roofs of Jerusalem overlooking the temple area, would resemble a forest in motion, for all carried palm branches in their hands which were more than a man's height in length. Great silence would fall on the assembled throng as the choir of Levites commenced to sing the Hallel (the specially prescribed "Praise" for the great festivals, consisting of Ps. 113-118), to each line of which the people had to respond with "Hallelujah." Soon the whole crowd fell into order, and, led by the priests, marched in procession round the altar. Seven times they encompassed it. As the singers reached vv. 25 to 29 of Ps. 118, and joined in the words, "Ana Adonai Hoshio-na!" ("Hosanna, make Thy salvation now manifest, O Lord!"), "Ana Adonai Hatslich-na!" ("O Lord, send now prosperity!"), the people waved their palm branches and accompanied the song with loud exclamations of joy. And as they reached the words, "Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of Jehovah," the godly and spiritual among them would in their hearts greet the coming Messiah and King, to whom they well knew these words applied.

The joy accompanying this ceremonial was so great that it became a proverb. "He that hath not seen Simchat-bet-ha-Shdebhah, the joy of the drawing (and the pouring) of the water, hath not seen joy in this life." Now, though the rabbis attached a symbolic significance to the ceremonial in connection with the dispensation of the rain, the amount of which for the year they imagined was determined by God at this feast; and perhaps also a commemorative sense, as reminding them of the wonders God wrought in the wilderness in giving them water out of a rock, the main reference according to themselves, as already said, was to the future blessings to be bestowed on them in Messiah's time, and especially pointed to the pouring out of the Spirit; as is to be inferred from the singing by the multitude of Isa. 12:3, and from the distinct statement in the Talmud (Jer., Sukkah 5, also Tosefta Sukkah 4). "Why is it called Bet-ka-Sho'ebhah? (the joy of drawing or pouring). Because of the pouring of the Holy Spirit, according to what is said: 'With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation!'" Now, in a limited though very blessed degree, this has already been fulfilled, for it was in reference to this ceremonial of the pouring of water that our Lord Jesus "on the last day—the great day of the feast"—stood and cried, saying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink. He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said, our of His belly shall flow rivers of living water: and this He spake of the Spirit which they that believed were about to receive"; in accordance with which, when once Jesus was glorified, on being raised from the dead and taken up to the right hand of God, the Spirit came down from heaven like a rushing mighty wind, and the Church of this dispensation was formed, every living member of which knows experimentally of the indwelling of this blessed heavenly Paraclete.

In its fulness, however, such a prophecy as Isa. 12 and the wonderful prediction of Joel—"And it shall come to pass afterward that I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh"—will only be realized subsequent to Israel's great national Day of Atonement. Then "the ransomed of Jehovah shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" (Isa. 35:10). Then shall Israel nationally experience the truth of Christ's word, "But the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into eternal life"; and then also "shall living waters go out from Jerusalem" for the quickening and refreshing of the whole world (Zech. 14:6).

2. Another feature in the Temple service of the Feast of Tabernacles also deserves mention, because of its rich symbolic import.

At the conclusion of the first day of the feast the worshippers congregated in the Court of the Women, where a great illumination took place. Four huge golden lamps or candelabras were there, each with four golden bowls, against which rested four ladders. Four youths of priestly descent ascended these with large pitchers of oil from which they filled each bowl. The old worn breeches and girdles of the priests served for wicks for these lamps. So great and brilliant was the light that, according to a saying, "There was not a court in Jerusalem that was not lit up by it." Around these great golden burning lamps a sacred dance took place, in which even the hassidim (saints) and "the men of deed," or prominent leaders of the people, with flaming torches in their hands, danced before the people and sang before them hymns and songs of praise. "The Levites also, with harps, and lutes, and cymbals, and trumpets, and with instruments of music without number, stood upon the fifteen steps which led down from the Court of Israel to that of the Women, according to the number of the fifteen 'Songs of Degrees' in the Book of Psalms."

This illumination, too, was regarded as of the same twofold symbolic significance as the pouring of the water. It reminded them of the past when God led them in the wilderness with the cloud of glory and the pillar of fire—of the Shekinah glory which dwelt in the first temple, but was, alas! already absent in the second; but it also, and chiefly, was meant to remind them of the Messianic promises in the future when the light of Jehovah should arise upon their land and people.

Now this, too, has, in a partial degree, been already fulfilled, for He who cried, "If any man thirst let him come unto Me and drink," at this same feast, and in reference to this illumination, again spake unto them, saying, "I am the Light of the world; he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the Light of Life"; and since then hundreds of millions who have heard His voice, and have followed in His steps, have had their hearts and souls, their present and their future eternity illumined by His Gospel. But while this is so, Israel, as a nation, still walks in darkness, and the other peoples of the earth are still covered by the shadow of death—until the Sun of Righteousness shall arise with healing in His wings, and the word shall go forth: "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of Jehovah is risen upon thee." Then "nations," as nations, "shall come to thy light; and kings to the brightness of thy glory" (Isa. 60:1-3); and the promise confirmed by the oath of Him who cannot lie shall be fulfilled: "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of Jehovah" (Num. 14:21).

The Feast of Tabernacles was the only one that had an octave, "the last and great day of the feast," the Azereth — "conclusion," or "crowning feast of all the feasts of the year," as Philo, the Alexandrian, called it; on which Israel dwelt no longer in booths to remind them of the wilderness but returned to their homes to rejoice there, and to begin, so to say, a cycle beyond the one of seven which they had just completed.

Now the eighth day in Scripture is the Resurrection Day, and points, I believe, to the Eternal Day, after the cycle of time in which the history of the earth, as set forth in the Sacred Calendar of the History of Redemption, shall have been finished, when the consummation of earthly rest shall synchronize with the commencement of heavenly glory—"when a great voice out of the throne shall go forth, saying: Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He shall dwell with them, and they shall be His people. And God Himself shall be with them and be their God. And God shall wipe away every tear from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things have passed away" (Rev. 21:1-8).

"Then," to conclude with the words of an old divine, the mystery of the water which was poured upon the sacrifices shall be fulfilled, when He who is the Alpha and the Omega shall proclaim, It is done, 'I will give to him that is athirst of the water of life freely.' Then He who, at the Feast of Tabernacles, invited sinners to come to Him and drink, shall lead His redeemed people by living fountains of water, and make them drink of the river of His pleasures. Then, too, the symbol of the palm branches shall be accomplished in the final victory of the redeemed over Death and Hades; and they shall realize the blessed fulfilment of the promise, 'He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be My Son.'

"Then, too, shall be the great Hosanna, when that great multitude, which no man could number, out of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, shall stand before the throne of God, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and *palm*s in their hands, and shall 'cry with a loud voice, saying: Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb' (Rev. 7:9,10)."

During that blessed millennial period the knowledge of the glory of Jehovah shall indeed cover the earth, and all nations shall walk in His light. Sin and iniquity will no longer be allowed to lift up their head, and apostasy and rebellion will be visited with instant punishment whenever they manifest themselves. Yet we know from prophetic Scripture that the hearts of multitudes among the Gentile nations will not be fully subdued to God and His truth, even in the Millennium, and that many of them will render only a feigned submission to the Divine King, whose throne shall be on Mount Zion. There follows therefore the warning to the nations against disobedience to His command to come up to Jerusalem to render homage to the King, Jehovah of hosts. "And it shall be that whoso of the families of the earth goeth not up unto Jerusalem to worship the King, Jehovah of Hosts, upon them there shall be no rain" which commentators take to mean the "early rain," which generally falls in Palestine about the end of October and the beginning of November soon after Tabernacles, but (geshem—the word here used) usually stands simply for heavy, torrential rain, (yoreh), being the special word for the "early rain." Besides, this is a threat uttered, not against Israel and Palestine, but the Gentile nations, whose seasons and climates may be altogether different.

The word is to be taken first of all in its literal sense. The withholding of rain was one of the ways by which God was accustomed to punish the apostasy of His own people in the days of the theocracy, and He now threatens to inflict it on the Gentile nations in case of disobedience. At the same time there is also here a blending of the literal and the spiritual, and the punishment threatened includes also the withholding from the disobedient nations or; families of the showers of God's grace and blessing, of which the literal rain is often used in Scripture as an emblem.

For this punishment, in case of disobedience there will be no exception and escape. This is the thought expressed in the two following verses: "And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, then also not upon them; there shall be the plague wherewith Jehovah will plague the nations that go not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles."

This is the literal rendering of the words as they stand in the Hebrew text, but the actual meaning is not absolutely certain.

The thought that Egypt if disobedient will be overtaken in the same judgment is solemnly repeated in the 19th verse: "This shall be the punishment of Egypt and the punishment of all the nations that go not up to keep the Feast of Tabernacles." The word used here for punishment is hattath, which primarily means "sin"; but it signifies also sin in its effects, as bringing punishment in its train. The word stands also sometimes for "sin-offering," which reminds us of the intimate relation that exists in God's moral government of the world between sin and its punishment, and helps us to understand such a statement as that Christ, who knew no sin, was made sin for us—namely, a sin-offering, enduring and bearing the consequence of sin on our behalf.

In the last two verses we reach the glorious goal and climax of vision and prophecy. God's original purpose in the calling and election of Israel—"Ye shall be unto Me a Kingdom of priests, an holy nation"—shall at last be realized; the aim and purpose of the whole law,—namely, that His people might learn the meaning of holiness and become holy because Jehovah their God is holy; but to which, so long as they were in bondage to the law, they could not attain, shall at last be fulfilled when they are brought into a condition of grace, and when God shall put His law into their inward parts and write it on their hearts then the world shall witness for the first time the glorious spectacle of a whole nation, and every individual member of it, wholly consecrated to Jehovah, and an earthly capital which shall truly answer to its name, "The Holy City," because it shall in many ways be the earthly counterpart and reflection of the glory of the New Jerusalem, which will come down out of heaven from God.

And not only shall Qodesh la-Yehovah—"Holiness (or 'holy') unto the Lord" be written on their persons, and on all the outward and inward life of the whole community, but on everything they possess. "In that day shall there be (engraven) on the bells of the horses, Holy unto Jehovah: and the pots in Jehovah's House"—which were used for the boiling of the sacrificial flesh, of which the common people, as well as the priests, could eat, and were therefore regarded as less holy—"shall be like the bowls before the altar"—in which the blood of the sacrifices was received, and out of which it was sprinkled, or poured, upon the altar, and therefore regarded as most holy. In the words of a deep student of Scripture, "The whole external character of life—that which is exhibited in the streets of a city (represented by the tinkling-sound of the bells of the passing horses) shall bear in all its parts, throughout all its detail, the impress of holiness unto the Lord. Religious life and fellowship shall be holy also; for the pots in the Lord's House, vessels which of old the priests had so often defiled, shall be like the bowls of the altar. Private and domestic life shall be hallowed too; for 'every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah (that is, throughout the holy land) shall be holy unto Jehovah of Hosts; and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them and seethe (or boil) in them.' For everything alike shall be holy, and all such distinctions as 'profane,' 'holy,' and 'most holy,' shall completely cease 'in that day.'"

"The distinction between holy and profane can only cease, however," to quote yet another writer, "when the sin and moral defilement which first evoked this distinction, and made it necessary that the things intended for the service of God should be set apart and receive a special consecration, have been entirely removed and wiped away. To remove this distinction, to prepare the way for the cleansing away of sin, and to sanctify once more that which sin had desecrated, was the object of the sacred institutions appointed by God. To this end Israel was separated from the nations of the earth, and in order to train it up as a holy nation, and to secure the object described, a law was given to it, in which the distinction between holy and profane ran through all the relations of life. And this goal will be eventually reached by the people of God, and sin with all its consequences be cleansed away by the judgment. In the perfected Kingdom of God there will be no more sinners, but only such as are righteous and holy." (Keil)

Finally, "there shall be no more a Canaanite in the House of Jehovah of Hosts in that day." The Hebrew word Khena'ani, means also "trader," or "merchant," because in early times the Canaanites, especially the Phoenicians, were known in the world as traders. Some therefore prefer to render the clause, "There shall no more be a trafficker in the House of the Lord," which is also the rendering of the Jewish Targum. But whether we take the term Canaanite to stand for the unclean and the godless, or understand it as meaning merchant or trafficker, the sense is practically the same. Nothing that defileth, or that maketh an abomination or a lie, or that could disturb the peace or mar the holiness, shall in anywise be permitted to enter that House, which "in that day" shall be the House of Prayer for all nations.

"For this shall be the law of the House: upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall he most holy. Behold, this is the law of the House." (Ezek. 43:12)

(The Visions and Prophecies of Zechariah, David Baron)

Compare this account in Zechariah with that in Revelation?

Now compare this with the events described in Ezekiel chapters 38 and 39.

Will Zechariah 14:3-4 be the literal fulfillment of Acts 1:11-12?

Isa. 25:9-10 Rom. 11